How Christian Prudes and Hypocrites Hate the Image of God.

400 Years of Freethought.

From Columbus to Ingersoll

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons have subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might have been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type have reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits have proved the most expensive—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractive—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will give the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called “half-tone” pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Announcement.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 12th FRANKLIN STEINER will answer the question, "DOES CHRISTIANITY PREVENT CRIME?"

The Campaign in This State.

We hope our readers will give us what moral and financial aid they can in circulating the petition to the legislature for the repeal of the Sunday laws in this state. It is particularly the fight of the citizens of New York, but as every struggle of this kind anywhere in the country helps in all states, aid from outsiders interested in the attempt to realize the Nine Demands will not be refused.

The time is particularly opportune this winter, as there is to be a general discussion of the Sunday issue at Albany. The liquor dealers of the state seem to have been promised by both parties—and very strongly by the party which won in the late election—that their interests shall be considered, and legislation in their interests enacted. This is generally understood to mean opening the saloons for a portion of each Sunday. Of course such legislation will be strenuously resisted by the ecclesiastics, who see in this another chance for the people to slip away from them. The matter will be argued pro and con, and the church will show her hand, and the clergy are sure to expose the real animus of their protests against the proposed law, which is to save to themselves the day on which they earn their living.

This will give the Freethinkers their opportunity, and they will miss it sadly if they do not jump in and see that the legislators have the true doctrine on the Sunday question presented to them.

We propose to send the petitions out all through the state, together with printed arguments against any Sunday legislation; to get the petitions signed numerously and presented to every member of the Senate and Assembly; and when the Sunday legislation is referred to the proper committee for consideration and recommendation thereon, it is our intention to have some good men represent the Freethinkers and make some speeches to that committee.

This will cost money—a good deal of it. We ought to have five hundred dollars at least. The clerical forces will spend thousands of dollars. The Freethinkers cannot do that, but we believe they can raise enough to do what we have so briefly outlined. THE TRUTH SEEKER is bound to do something to start the thing going, and how vigorous we can make the fight will depend upon how much we are aided. A ten dollar bill will do a great deal, and we would like to have every New Yorker who can afford it send us one of them to push this along. If you cannot send ten, send five, or four, or whatever you can spare for this work.

Let us hear from you at once, friends, so we can know what to depend upon. The more you send the hotter will we make the fight.

A Distinction Without a Difference.

We are sorry to see that Dr. Buckley, of the Christian Advocate, is inclined to split hairs. Some time ago he censured the mayor of Waterbury, Conn., for publicly receiving Monsignor Satolli. The rebuke was timely and pertinent. A few weeks later there was unveiled at Batavia, in this state, a tablet to the memory of Robert Morris, the financier of the Revolution. At this function Bishop Ryan, Catholic, Bishop Coxe, Episcopalian, and another Protestant minister of Buffalo, offered prayers. Secretary Carlisle delivered a historical address. In condemning this mingling of religion and public affairs, we called the attention of the Christian Advocate to its former utterances and asked if it would speak with an equal clearness of condemnation concerning the Batavia affair. To this Dr. Buckley replies:

"First, the unveiling of this statue to Robert Morris was not an act of the government. Second, the function performed by Secretary Carlisle was not an act of an officer. Third, therefore the prayers of these persons had nothing to do with the relations of church and state. Fourth, the mayor of Waterbury was receiving Monsignor Satolli, the ablegate of the pope. The pope is not merely a spiritual head, but claims the right to maintain a temporal government. The mayor of Waterbury received Satolli in his official capacity of papal ablegate, in his own official capacity as mayor of Waterbury."

Technically and narrowly the act of Secretary Carlisle was not official; in a broader, truer sense it was. Nearly all the members of the cabinet and several state officers were present. They were not there as private citizens, but because they were officials. Mr. Carlisle delivered an address, not because he was John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, but because he was Secretary of the Treasury Carlisle. So far as we are aware, the dedication of a monument or tablet could not be, strictly speaking, an act of the government, for its officers are not elected or appointed for any such purpose, but it is also true that Grover Cleveland was not elected for the purpose of issuing thanksgiving proclamations, and yet he issues them and his act is official and serves to help unite church and state. The ministers who were present and prayed were there by invitation as ministers and not as citizens, and they prayed in their capacity as ministers and not as citizens. The man who was honored by the exercises was honored not as a private citizen but as a man of public affairs who as such had rendered his country illustrious service. The difference between the act of the mayor of Waterbury and the acts of the national and state officials at Batavia was one of the letter merely; in spirit they were identical.

When Dr. Buckley called attention to the fact that Monsignor Satolli represented the Pope, who claims the right to maintain a temporal government, he probably had for a moment forgotten that Bishop Ryan, who prayed at the Batavia unveiling, is also a representative of this Pope who claims the right to maintain a temporal government. If we remember aright, Monsignor Satolli was not called upon by the mayor of Waterbury to exercise any of his priestly offices, but Bishop Ryan was asked to do so at Batavia and he there exercised the priestly office of prayer, for it would be foolish to suppose that he prayed merely as a lay Christian, or that those who invited him to pray did so for any other reason than that he was a distinguished priest. And, as before said, the same is true of the Protestant ministers who said prayers at the unveiling.

Dr. Buckley says that he understands the separation of church and state to be this:

"No one shall be compelled to profess or support a religion in which he does not believe, or any religion, and that no money shall be allowed by the state for the support of any religious institution as such."

Further along, however, he declares that the service of chaplains in the national Senate and House and in the legislatures of the states is simply a form "pleasing to many and pernicious to none." Is it possible that Dr. Buckley does not know that a chaplaincy is a "religious institution as such," and that the taxpayers are compelled to pay therefor? He has placed himself on record as opposed to the union of church and state, and has defined said union as consisting in the enforced profession or support of religion, and yet the editor of the Christian Advocate says that the employment of chaplains in public institutions is a form "pleasing to many and pernicious to none," which is equivalent to saying that the union of church and state is pleasing to many and harmless to none. We are glad to have been able to discover Dr. Buckley's real sentiments.

"Whether a minister, Catholic, Protestant, or a Jewish rabbi, shall be invited to offer prayer at the unveiling of a tablet is a matter of taste and propriety. If all citizens are interested in the unveiling, the placing of representatives of the different religions on the program is in better taste than limiting it exclusively to one."

If all citizens are interested in such ceremony it will require the services of one hundred and forty-two ministers and priests and a Freethought lecturer to satisfy them all, if we proceed in the way recommended by Dr. Buckley. How much easier and more sensible it would be to dispense with all kinds of religious and anti-religious exercises, as the Liberals demand! Robert Morris was a man who served the state; the tablet to his memory was not the gift of a sect nor of a number of sects; it was patriotism, not religion, that honored him, and patriotism is not limited by the boundaries of sects. The presence of clergymen, as clergymen, at the Batavia unveiling was an intrusion, just as the postponing of Fourth of July celebrations and Decoration Day services when the Fourth of July and the thirtieth of May come on Sunday is an insult to the people as citizens; just as the saying of prayers and the singing of religious songs on those occasions are entirely out of place and should be sternly forbidden by those who have the exercises in charge. To the religionist the fullest liberty; to the citizen freedom from invasion.

For the past two months Colonel Ingersoll's new lecture, "About the Holy Bible," has been the most popular book on the list. It still sells by the hundred, but THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895 is at present cutting out the work and giving it a lively race.

What Is this About Anthony Comstock?

TESTIMONY BEFORE THE LEXOW COMMITTEE.

From the New York Sun.

Mr. Goff then called Louis S. Streep, who told this story without question: In 1889 he was arrested by Anthony Comstock for printing green goods circulars. At that time, he said, he had rented his printing-office to a man named Bechtold, while he, the witness, was in the country. While he was in the Tombs Bechtold gave Streep's wife $5,000 in cash to deposit for her husband's bail. Before she deposited it, Bechtold returned and got $2,000, saying that he had to give $1,500 to Anthony Comstock to prevent Streep's being indicted by the United States Grand Jury. Streep's bail was reduced at the same time to $3,000, and the cash was deposited. Streep jumped his bail and went to Europe. In July, 1890, he returned; went to the district attorney of the county and confessed all that he knew about the green goods circular business, and under the direction of the district attorney made a search of the city with three headquarters detectives for the men implicated by his confession. One day, after being out for many hours with Detective Reilly, he called on Mr. Comstock, and said that now that he had arranged things honorably with the state officials he would like to get the indictment against him in the state courts dismissed.

"Comstock said to me, 'I am the only man who can get that indictment dismissed.' He said it could be done if I would give him one thousand dollars. In August I called on Mr. Comstock with my brother and said to him, 'You said you could have that indictment in the state court dismissed. Here is a thousand dollars.' I had seven hundred dollars which my wife had realized from the sale of my printing-office, and I borrowed three hundred dollars in three bills from my brother Robert, who was with me. Comstock took the money, saying, 'I am not accepting this as a bribe, but as a donation to the society.'"

Q.: And was the indictment dismissed?

A.: Yes, sir; two of them.

Q.: And you gave him that money to procure their dismissal?

A.: Yes, sir.

Mr. Goff: Here are indictments indorsed "dismissed" at the time stated by the witness.

Senator Bradley: Who was the district attorney then?

Mr. Goff: Colonel Fellows.

Q.: Fully realizing your responsibility and the meaning of your answer, do you swear that you gave Anthony Comstock $1,000 for his influence in having these indictments dismissed?

A.: I swear before God and man I paid Anthony Comstock $1,000 to buy my liberty.

Senator Lexow: How do you bring this within the scope of our work, Mr. Goff?

Mr. Goff: I will explain in a moment, Senator.

Q.: Since then you've been indicted?

A.: Since then Anthony Comstock had me indicted on the same charge in the United States court. I was convicted, and am out pending an appeal.

Senator Lexow: How is this within our scope?

Mr. Goff: In a minute, Senator.

Then Robert Streep was called and swore that he was with his brother, and that he paid $1,000 to Anthony Comstock under the circumstances related.

Senator Lexow: How is this within our scope?

Mr. Goff: A failure to enforce the criminal laws is a neglect of duty by the police department. Also, we have shown that the police have protected the green goods men, and it is only fair to the police that we should show, if we can, that others have done the same.

Senator Lexow: It is a very serious charge against Mr. Comstock.

Anthony Comstock says that "imaginationalism" is corrupting the youth of the land. Yes, that is so; it is the imaginationalism of Anthony Comstock and the other anti-naturalists, who find impurity where a healthy mind would never think of looking for it. This imaginationalism of which he talks grows in the hotbeds of mystery, and mystery is fertilized with the compost of ignorance. Comstock is the chief promoter, officially, of that "Movement in favor of Ignorance," of which C. L. James wrote so tersely when he gave it its very apt and expressive name.

The War Between Light and Darkness.

The clericals did not have everything their own way last year. They did not succeed in closing the Mid-winter Fair at San Francisco on Sunday, nor the Cotton Palace at Waco, Texas. They did get a favorable decision from the Supreme Court of Michigan and from several inferior courts, and they won some of their fights against the Adventists. They also secured much local legislation, although they were beaten in Chicago. They greatly extended and strengthened their organization. As a general thing, they won when they appealed to judges and legislators, and were defeated when they came into conflict with men of business.

Mr. J. D. Shaw wisely devotes considerable space in his Independent Pulpit for December to the Sunday issue, giving, among the rest, an account of the struggle over the Sunday opening of the Cotton Palace in Waco. When the question was first raised the directors of the Palace voted to keep it open on Sunday. The ministerial contingent at once raised such a clamor that the directors were frightened and rescinded their opening vote. This determination aroused those who were opposed to the closing of the gates and before the first Sunday arrived it had become manifest that there was a strong sentiment antagonistic to the Sabbatarians, but the directors still feared the boycott threatened by the preachers and so the Palace was closed. About the locked gates thronged an insistent multitude who very freely expressed their opinion of the Puritans, and that opinion was the reverse of complimentary. These dissatisfied people did not flock to the open churches, as the preachers had evidently expected they would, but wandered up and down the streets, necessarily not contributing anything to the "Sabbath quiet" of the town, and the directors soon saw that they had made a serious mistake. On the Monday following the first Sunday the board convened in special meeting and adopted a motion for Sunday opening. It had been urged by the Sabbatarians that the women were opposed to Sunday opening, and as they had rendered substantial assistance to the enterprise the directors did not wish to offend them. One of the directors who was a Sunday closer said that he had promised the women that if they would assist in the work of decoration he would vote against opening. But when one of the city papers interviewed thirty-two of the women managers it was found that twenty-six favored Sunday opening, five opposed it, and one was undecided.

After the directors had taken their last vote in favor of opening, some of the preachers issued a call for a mass meeting in the Baptist church. Of the twenty-five hundred Christians in the city one hundred and seventeen, old and young, composed the "mass" meeting. After the usual talk about the "Holy Sabbath" and the sin of "desecrating" it, a committee, consisting of three preachers and two lawyers, was appointed to draw up resolutions in which the directors were condemned for opening on Sunday, Christian people were urged to stay away from the Exposition on all days of the week, and to withdraw their exhibits. Of course the later action would have been a violation of their contracts with the managers. The resolutions were adopted with but one dissenting vote.

But the boycott—or proposed boycott—was a flat failure. The next Sunday the gates were open and the attendance was phenomenally large. Everything went smoothly and providence did not even frown, nor were the boycotters missed. Waco is considered the most religious city in Texas, but the victory over the Sabbatarians appears to be complete. As the leaders of the Sunday law movement declare that Christianity must stand or fall with the "Sabbath" we wonder what they will think of the outcome of the fight at Waco, where, with the advantage of an overwhelmingly Christian public as the environment, the Sabbatarians were unable to rally more than a corporal's guard in favor of a closed Fair on Sunday. The Christians were divided regarding the desirability of Sunday closing and still more divided when it came to the question of the boycott. Some of the ministers did not attend the indignation meeting and only a few of the laity joined in the boycott. The real effects of our Liberal propagandism, as Mr. Shaw says, are as clearly seen on the inside of the churches as on the outside. In vain have the preachers and editors of the religious papers sought to rally their followers for a crusade against the desecrating Exposition. The denunciations of the preachers are laughed at by their own congregations.

Mr. Shaw is quite right in considering the defeat of the Texas Sabbatarians significant and encouraging, but he is mistaken in calling it a "local matter." It is no more local than a fight between two divisions of opposing armies. Those divisions may be widely separated from the larger parts of their respective hosts, but that does not make the battle a local one. The issue is not a local dispute, and that is the one thing that determines the character of the conflict. Every triumph won by the Sabbatarians, no matter where, counts as a moral force in the tremendous struggle, as does every victory achieved by the defenders of the free Sunday. This is a conflict between light and darkness, between education and ignorance, between rationalism and superstition, between liberty and despotism, between civilization and the church. The principles involved are of world-wide interest and every skirmish and every battle over them is an episode in a struggle upon the outcome of which depends the religious freedom of the people of every nation. The issue is, Sunday for the whole people or for the preachers exclusively. The latter have just as much right to claim any other day. The political church must be made to understand and to admit that it has no bill of sale of any day of the week.

The way "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is going it will not be long before we shall have to get out a new edition. With such a constituency as THE TRUTH SEEKER has the eagerness with which it is taking this great work is the best possible answer to the very few criticisms bestowed upon Mr. Putnam's method. As a sample of what competent critics think of "Four Hundred Years," we are proud to show our readers the following note from the gifted daughter of the ever-lamented Theron C. Leland:

"The 'Four Hundred Years of Freethought' arrived on my birthday. I am very much pleased with the book, particularly Mr. Putnam's opening exposition of the meaning of Freethought. I shall hand the book to people who ask me what Freethought means and what Freethinkers are after for the future. LILLIAN LELAND."

A football game at Grand Rapids, Mich., on November 29th, compelled the Park Congregational church to postpone its annual Thanksgiving service to the evening, as the Sunday-school leader and many other backers of the local team wanted to see the game more than they did to participate in the Thanksgiving exercises. We have not heard that the local team won; if it did not it is quite likely that the Sunday-school leader and the others did not feel very thankful in the evening, particularly if they lost much on the game. It would not be surprising if Judge Montgomery and his associates on the Michigan woolsack should now want the Sunday law stretched so as to cover Thanksgiving day. It is a shame that there is no law to prevent the men of God from being subjected to an ignominious competition from two football elevens. By all means let us have a Thanksgiving closing law.

We have received the National Secular Society's Almanac for 1895. It is got out in new and attractive shape, with a cover especially designed for it, and the contents are varied, interesting, and instructive. We notice, however, that there are many mistakes in the addresses of American lecturers. Several of these mistakes occurred in the Almanac for 1894 and one of the victims wrote to the publisher pointing out some of the errors and offering to revise the list for the next number, but the friendly offer was evidently not considered. The addresses of at least six of the lecturers are given in wrong cities or states or both. Unquestionably there has been no late revision of the list. The leading contributors to the Secular Almanac this year are George W. Foote, J. M. Wheeler, and Charles Watts. There are a number of good selected poems, including Putnam's "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" Jeremy Bentham's preface to his translation of Voltaire's comic romance "The White Bull," is liberally quoted.

We wish our readers would look at the date on their wrappers and see if they do not owe us a renewal. If they find they do, it will be a great favor to us if they will forward it at their earliest convenience, as we need the money. Owing to various causes, more than the usual number are in arrears at present, and this embarrasses us financially, or we wouldn't mention it. We like to keep square with the world, and in order that we may do this it is necessary that our readers keep square with us, for when they let their subscriptions run behind we have to get behind with others. We have no capital to fall back upon, and depend upon getting our dues to give others their due. If our friends who are in arrears will note these facts and act thereupon, it will be, as we have said, a great favor to us, and a favor duly and thankfully appreciated.

Comparisons based upon statistics are proverbially misleading, for it is very difficult to ascertain with any considerable degree of accuracy the relation which two sets of figures bear to each other. It is not improbable, however, that an increase of education contemporaneous with a decrease of crime indicates that the two facts have the connection of cause and effect. In 1870 the number of children in English schools was 1,500,000. At present the number is 5,000,000. The average number of persons in prisons and undergoing penal servitude has fallen from 12,000 to 5,000. As regards the worst crimes, the yearly average of persons sentenced to penal servitude has fallen from 3,000 to 800. In juvenile crime the number of young persons committed has fallen from 14,000 to 5,000. The number of paupers has decreased from forty-seven per thousand to twenty-two per thousand. Doubtless other factors than that of primary education have aided to produce this marked decrease of crime—as registered in convictions—but its part is no doubt a very important one, and the general result is decidedly gratifying, whatever the causes.

Friends far and near appreciate the importance of the campaign inaugurated in this state for the repeal of the Sunday laws which disgrace our statute books. They see that it is of vital importance that, above the half-hearted pleadings for the modification of those laws in the interest of this or that class, there shall ring out a clear and unmistakable demand for their unconditional abrogation. It is not a question of expediency or of private privileges, but one of equal liberty and impartial justice. Among the others who have promptly reached us helping hands is Mr. W. L. Taylor, of Hartford, Connecticut, who writes:

"Although not a resident of New York, my practical sympathy is with you in your legislative campaign, and I inclose my contribution, $10. Let the good work go on."

Our old friend, D. M. Worley, of Lebanon, Ohio, sends one dollar for the same work, and Mrs. Mary Dunham, of New London, Connecticut, contributes seventy-five cents, while Captain Silas Latham puts his hand in his pocket and hands over twenty-five dollars. This is encouraging and we heartily thank these comrades for their timely co-operation and hope that they will find many imitators. The petitions are being rushed out, and the state will be flooded with explanatory and argumentative documents if the funds come in to cover the expense of printing and to pay the postage. Let us make it uncomfortably hot for bigotry this winter.

It is with deep regret that we learn of the death of Leroy Dutton, of Grand Mound, Clinton county, Iowa. He died on December 20th, and was interred, by his special request, on his farm. The funeral services were entirely non-religious, as he had wished, and were conducted by Dr. J. H. Randall, of Chicago. Leroy Dutton was one of the best-known of the Freethinkers of Iowa, and he was loved and respected by all who had the honor of his acquaintance. By industry and wise management he was in possession of a competence, and he never failed to give generously to the cause with which he had for so many years been openly identified. His home was always the Freethought pilgrim's resting place, and it was a delightful oasis in the desert of hard work and Christian hatred. This home was filled with Liberal literature, with the pictures of the champions of human liberty, and the very atmosphere breathed of the grand new world that is slowly dawning. Mr. Dutton was one of the staunchest friends that D. M. Bennett had in the years when the foes of freedom and light were striving to crush him, and the name of THE TRUTH SEEKER's founder was a household word with all the Duttons, and particularly with Leroy Dutton and Flora, his wife, now many years in the embrace of the universal mother. Who ever was D. M. Bennett's enemy or lukewarm friend could not be the friend of the loyal Duttons. Of the four Dutton brothers, all Freethinkers, the genial Jerome died last year and now the second follows him, leaving Lorenzo and Charles to fight yet many years, let us hope, for the disenthralment and enlightenment of man. Leroy Dutton lived as became a true man and he died without fear. May we all do as well.

The fall and winter being more particularly the reading season, and naturally the renewing of subscription season, we hope that our friends will make a little effort to send THE TRUTH SEEKER some new subscribers. A good many of our old ones have had to drop off during the past eighteen months of panic and dullness in the business world, and we need some more to take their places and push on the work. Our friends have never failed us in an emergency, and we again venture to ask them to do something to help by inducing new subscriptions. We have tried to make this easy by the premium offers printed on the second page of this paper, and we think considerable can be done by our friends if they will take the trouble to speak a good word for us to their Liberal acquaintances.

To those who feel like presenting THE TRUTH SEEKER for a short time to some dear friend, our Trial Subscription offer opens the way at a small cost. A great many of the Liberals to whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is first sent this way become permanent subscribers and earnest workers in the cause of mental liberty.

And lastly, after you have induced some acquaintance to subscribe, and sent THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to some friend, send us the names of all the Liberals you know, and we will send them sample copies, and see if they, too, will not subscribe. We need them all.

The legislative season is here. Congress is already at work, and many of the state legislatures are also in session. Soon all will be, and this is the opportunity for the political Christians. During the next six months these meddlers will be more active than ever before. We want each of our readers to constitute him- or herself a committee of one to keep watch of the enemies of the secular state. Report to us immediately every movement of the theocrats. Look out for new Sunday laws and attempts to more rigorously enforce old ones; watch for appropriations to the church and to institutions under the control of the church; gather all the facts that you can in relation to the exemption of church property from taxation; be vigilant in regard to religious teaching in the schools; note what is said and done about the employment and payment of chaplains; do not fail to keep informed and to inform us as to the attacks which the anti-naturalists are sure to make on the agencies of expression and transmission. Do not assume that the Editor will find out all about these things through the daily papers; there are hundreds of those journals, and there are only seven days in the week; something of vital importance to our cause may escape his eye and yours may catch it in the nick of time; it will be better for him to have his attention called to it repeatedly than not to see it at all. So send along the items. In this connection we will request all the members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps and all others who will now engage to write one letter each week to the target selected by the Captain to send us their names and addresses, not for publication, but that we may know how many there are, and so be better enabled to direct their activities. Let us make the coming year memorable in the annals of Secularism.

Mat. vi, 5: "And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward." 6. "But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy father which is in secret; and thy father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." All the way through Jesus's teaching, you see, everything is to be done for a reward. Any one would think that Jesus's idea was that no action could be good unless there were some external profit in it. It makes one think of wise old Mencius again, and his rebuke to the king who presumed that Mencius had come "provided with counsels to profit my kingdom." "Why must your majesty use that word 'profit'?" What I am provided with are counsels to benevolence and righteousness, and these are my only topics. Let also your majesty say, Benevolence and Righteousness, and these shall be the only themes. Why must you use that word 'profit'?"

As I do not believe in prayer, I am of course unable to see any sublime morality in this injunction. God is said to be all-wise and unchangeable. Why pray to him for anything? He knows your want before you do. Why pray to him to do anything? What he will do he knew before you existed; if it is what you want, it must be done whether you pray or not; if it is not what you want done, he is unchangeable, and your prayer that he shall change his decree, ordered from all eternity, is an impious attempt to make the unchangeable mind change itself and destroy its attribute of unchangeableness.

If it is right that your prayer should be in secret, as Jesus says, why is it that Christians still do most of their praying in public, and that principally on one day in the week only? The main use of this ceremony nowadays seems to be to pray and worship in public in order to obtain a reputation for piety and sanctimonious life, under cover of which it is found much easier to rob banks and other public and private institutions. Prayer must be impious in theory; in practice, hypocrisy. All the great bank thieves, wreckers, and financial swindlers have previously gained a great reputation for piety and prayerfulness. Don't pray; it takes you into bad company.

The Lord's prayer (Mat. vi, 7-13): In his previous remarks Jesus has been telling you not to pray in the manner that the hypocrites (by which he generally means scribes and pharisees) pray, but pray in secret. Now he adds, "But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do; for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. Be ye not, therefore, like unto them; for your heavenly father knoweth what things ye have need of, before you ask him. After this manner, therefore, pray ye." Then follows the well-known Lord's Prayer, beginning, "Our father which art in heaven," etc.

Jesus intimates that he will give you a new and original form of prayer; it has always passed for his own, and has been called the Lord's Prayer in consequence. There is nothing original about it. It is a mere "vain repetition" of the prayers of these same hypocrites and heathens that he is denouncing, and is made up of fragments of the prayers then current amongst the very people he is warning you not to imitate. Wetstein says: "It is a curious fact that the Lord's Prayer may be reconstructed almost verbatim out of the Talmud" (quoted by Greg, 321, out of Mackay's "Progress of Intellect," ii, 379). James ("Study of Primitive Christianity," p. 36) says: "Some of the prayers in use in the synagogues in these early periods have been preserved to us in the writings of the rabbis. They contain such familiar expressions as these—as familiar doubtless to the ears of the youthful Jesus as to our own: 'Our father, who art in heaven, proclaim the unity of thy name, and establish thy kingdom perpetually.' 'Let us not fall into the power of sin, transgression, or iniquity, and lead us not into temptation.' 'Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, the power, the glory, and the majesty.' 'Our father who art in heaven, thy will be done on high; do whatsoever seemeth good in thy sight. Give me only bread to eat, and raiment to put on. Forgive, O Lord, those who have this day offended thee.'"

Not only is the prayer itself a "vain repetition" of that of these very hypocrites, but when he tells you not to "use vain repetitions as the heathens do, for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking," he is not even here teaching any new thought. He is only re-echoing the preacher in Ecclesiastes (v, 1-3): "Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God, and be more ready to hear than to give the sacrifice of fools; for they consider not that they do evil. Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter anything before God; for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth; therefore let thy words be few. A fool's voice is known by a multitude of words."

Mat. vi, 14, 15: "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly father will also forgive you; but if you forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your father forgive your trespasses."

Peter asked (Mat. xiii, 21, 22): "Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?" Jesus replied, "I say not unto you, until seven times; but until seventy times seven."

As far as forgiveness goes, it is right for men to forgive, just as it is right not to bear hatred to enemies, because unforgiveness and hatred, carried beyond just resentment, simply soil men's characters, both with the hater and the hated. The real truth is well expressed by Edgar Fawcett thus:

I envy not the ethic range
Of him whose virtues would require
That wrong and right should interchange
For so much heaven like so much hire.

Nor deem philanthropy hath laws
To dole thee pay like sordid pelf;
Love thou thy fellowman because
To hate him were to soil thyself!

Jesus teaches that we are to forgive in order that God may forgive us, a most immoral doctrine, because if God exists he cannot forgive. It does not matter whether your conception of the ultimate cause of things is a God, or whether you disbelieve in God and in his place put the universal Cosmos, the sum of all nature. The result, as far as the consequences of actions go, is identical in each case. Cause producing effect, and effect again becoming cause, as inexorably as the grinding of the fabled mills of the gods, that must be the logical conception. As Greg (p. 337) says, "the punishment of sin consists in the consequences of sin." Neither God, nor nature, can avert the consequences of any act once done; and most of all the idea that God could forgive sin is monstrous and immoral, especially so when taken in conjunction with the Christian doctrine of forgiveness following on repentance for sin. The last thing that God could forgive, the thing that he positively could not forgive, is implied in the idea that his eternal laws could be broken and man not suffer the consequences, more or less, according to the degree of his misdoing.

When Jesus represents (Luke xv, 7) more joy in heaven over the repentance of one sinner than over ninety-nine just persons that need no repentance, he is describing a very just human feeling, because the fewer sinners there are on earth, the less evil and bad results there will be to mankind. Men are justified by the nature of their surroundings in forgiving, in giving merit to repentance, and in saying "go and sin no more," and in letting the matter rest there. But to ascribe any such power to God is merely to clothe him with one more human and impossible attribute, and to make your conception of him the more that of a man-God; and the more man-like your conception of God is, the more contradictory it becomes.

Mat. vi, 16-18. This saying applies to fasting, so we need not notice it at length, except to say that the only possible connection between fasting and morality is, that a man with an empty stomach is much less likely to be inclined to morality than a man with a full one. It was probably fasting, interlarded with a diet of such generous richness as locusts and wild honey, that made all these old prophets so fanatical, impractical, and visionary. Probably very few of them, Jesus included, would have had any of their visions if they had been properly fed. A man living on a healthy diet would not have been very likely to invite people "to eat of his flesh, and drink of his blood" (John vi, 53, et seq.). The day before Jesus issued this invitation he had performed the feat of feeding five thousand men on five loaves and two small fishes. So his share of the feast was probably a very tiny one, and it is understandable that he should have been delirious the next day, and have mistaken himself for bread and meat and drink. Even a cat fed on flies is said to grow thin and poor, though they relish such food; but I never heard that cats became visionary or inspired on it. Of nearly all of these inspired prophets it is related that they were on the verge of starvation or lived on such food as the juicy and succulent locust and wild honey. John the Baptist lost his head on this diet long before Herod had it cut off for him.

Freethought and the Bible.

Freethought and investigation, and the exercise and cultivation of the judgment unbiased by prejudice and uninfluenced by self-aggrandizement or popularity, is the right and duty of all. Allowing others to think for us and adopting their views, without consulting our own reason, has led the masses in all ages into error and ignorance.

All great reforms and achievements that contribute to the welfare of the human race, are the fruits of Freethought. Civilization and the emancipation of the human race from the oppression of the dark ages, when human life was of as little consequence as that of a goat or sheep, has been accomplished by the genius and independence of men without regard to what others might say, do, or believe. Creeds have fought them at every step, and many of the brightest intellects and noblest benefactors have been imprisoned, tortured, or slain by the decrees of pontifical courts and ecclesiastical tribunals, and by priests and potentates claiming to be agents of God.

Creeds, dogmas, and isms, the phantoms of the imagination of man in his crude state, dwindle into mere falsehoods when reason and common sense turn their microscopic eyes upon them, yet they still live, a curse to the world.

The Mosaic account of the creation bears upon its every page the stamp of ignorance. The whole story of the making of Adam and the subsequent method resorted to to produce Eve; the garden with its tempting but forbidden fruit; the introduction of the serpent by God himself to lead his only son and daughter to transgression, thus becoming aider and abettor in the crime; the curse pronounced upon the whole unborn human race in consequence of their first parents falling victims to God's own cunning scheme of deception and seduction, and the curse pronounced upon the serpent for faithfully performing the part set him in the great drama or tragedy, that he should go upon his belly ever after when he never went otherwise, is the simplest and most detestable nonsense that ever emanated from the brains of man, and is a scandalous libel on the God they profess to love and worship.

Also the tragic account of Cain and Abel and the failure of God's design that Cain should be a fugitive and vagabond in the earth, and the marking or branding him (as Western ranchmen do their cattle), "lest any finding him might kill him," when the human race composed only himself, father, and mother; then, when we take into account how Cain played a lone hand and euchred the Lord, by going to dwell in the land of Nod, knew his wife, and built up a city, we have reached a point of simplicity or duplicity that has no parallel outside the Bible.

And, again, the fabulous story of the flood, the Lord choosing Noah as his right bower, the collection of male and female of all animals and creeping things from the whole world's surface, their journeying thousands and thousands of miles over seas and sandy deserts, across rivers, lofty mountains, and extensive plains; from the frigid and the torrid zone, from the land of ever-blooming flowers and from the perpetual snows and icebergs of the polar regions, to take passage in a rude craft that afforded less than three square feet per capita, by modern measurement, with no ventilation, save one hole of less dimension than the hatchway of an ocean steamer, shows the prevailing ignorance of the vastness of the universe at that epoch of the world's history.

The total destruction of the whole human race, save Noah and his family, to restore the races yet unborn to the perfect goodness of their first parents when first from the hands of the Lord, proved also a failure, for men soon became "wicked and evil continually," and after two disastrous failures the Lord made use of Moses and the sword to reclaim fallen man.

Moses' education had been somewhat neglected, for with no less a personage to assist him than the Lord, he was forty days on the mount to formulate the Ten Commandments, that any country justice or town clerk could compile in as many minutes. Nevertheless, Moses is represented as being the best man, for when the Lord's wrath waxed hot against his chosen people, "Moses besought the Lord, and he repented the evil he had thought to do them."

But the most diabolical destructive butchery dictated by licentious lust and filthy lucre, was the destruction of the Midianites and the confiscation of their vast possessions, the burning of all their cities, and the putting to death all the men and women, and all the males among the little ones, and saving 32,000 virgins for Moses and Eleazar the priest's use. The Lord was said to have a share of the booty and beauty, but failing to put in an appearance, his portion went to other participants in the outrage.

Who can believe that such an unprovoked massacre of innocence was the fulfillment of a command from the Lord as recorded in the "book of books?"

And, again, Joshua commanding the sun to stand still that he might annihilate the defeated, fleeing people; and the Lord, knowing what Josh wanted, stopped the earth in its accustomed revolution. Samson and the three hundred foxes with firebrands tied to the tails; Jonah taking passage in the stomach of the big fish; the Lord sending two she-bears to destroy, tear limb from limb and joint from joint, forty thoughtless children for telling a bald-headed old tramp to go up, where God subsequently took him bodily without change of raiment. Also the colloquy between the Lord and Satan the devil, resulting in the most inhuman affliction of God's faithful servant to convince his satanic majesty that Job was the best horse in the race, dog in the ring, or cock in the pit!

These and many others might be mentioned as the Mother Goose stories of the ignorant ages of the past, and should never be allowed in any household in the land. They rob their God of all the attributes of love, justice, mercy, power, and goodness, and reduce him to a level with man in the earliest ages of his existence, when the masses were ruled by brute force, regardless of age, condition, or sex.

Salvation by Meanness.

And another thing I would do if I were a Christian. I should respect Jesus too much to permit him to pay the whole of my indebtedness. I think it the meanest and most sycophantish attitude possible to go about singing:

"Nothing in my hands I bring; Simply to thy cross I cling."

A man who could submit to be "saved" by such a passive process is certainly not worth the "saving." Man is simply what he can do. If he can do nothing, he is nothing. Man may yet be "saved" by self-respect, but certainly never by self-abasement. The nailing of all the rest of creation up to trees would not help you one iota. Salvation—and damnation, too—is personal, not vicarious. When I hear of saints mean enough to try, in their own selfish interest, to ignore the law of inexorable destiny by which every physical, mental, and moral tub must stand on its own bottom, I am reminded of the following incident:

The famous surgeon, Velpeau, was visited one day at his house, during the consultation hour, by a marquis renowned for his meanness. Velpeau informed the marquis that an operation was urgent and that the fee would amount to 4,000 francs. At this the marquis made a wry face, and left. A fortnight later Dr. Velpeau, while making his rounds in the Hospital de la Charité, had his attention attracted by a face that seemed familiar to him. In answer to his inquiry, it was stated that the patient was a footman of a nobleman in the Faubourg Saint Germain. The surgeon found that his case resembled in every particular the somewhat unusual one for which the marquis had consulted him a fortnight previously. He refrained, however, from making any comment.

Three weeks after the operation, when the patient was about to be discharged, Dr. Velpeau called him aside, and exclaimed: "Monsieur, I am extremely flattered and pleased to have been able to cure you. There is, however, a small formality with which you will have to comply before I can sign your exeat, that is, you will have to write a cheque for 10,000 francs on behalf of the public charity bureau of our metropolitan districts." The patient's face became livid. "You can do what you like about it," continued the doctor, "but if you refuse, all Paris will know to-morrow that the Marquis de D—— adopted the disguise of a footman in order to secure free treatment at this hospital, and to usurp the place which belongs by right to a pauper." To be cured on the cheap, this marquis assumed the guise of a footman. To be "saved" on the cheap, the orthodox betakes himself to the attitude of a louse.—Saladin.

An Hour's Reflection.

Ten minutes I've thought on the time I have wasted—
How sad the reflection, poignant with pain!
Ten minutes I've thought on the pleasures I've tasted,
On the vortex of folly fallacious and vain.

Ten minutes I've pondered my present condition—
Life's glorious meridian clouded and past;
Ten minutes I've sighed that in hope's full fruition,
My span of existence ever was cast.

Ten minutes I've given the dark, dreary future,
Which still is impending to mark my decline;
Ten minutes I've wept and devoted to nature—
Oh, what a sad hour of reflection was mine!

The Manhattan Liberal Club.—Celebration of Its Twenty-fifth Anniversary.

On the evening of December 28th the oldest Liberal organization in New York, and probably the oldest in the United States, celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary in German Masonic hall, where its regular meetings have been held for the past fourteen years, many of which have been reported for these columns at more or less length by the "Man with the Badgepin." There was a full house soon after eight o'clock, and late comers found standing room only. A few seats had been reserved for present and former members, but only a few of the latter could be rallied; many have moved far away, and many are too far along in years to risk night meetings in winter. After the usual preliminaries the regular program began with an address by the president, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr. Then came a brief historical review of the club by one of its organizers, Mr. T. B. Wakeman, who was followed in some reminiscences by Mr. Wilson MacDonald. These two are the only members whose certificates date back to 1869 and who have continued as regular attendants. Others have come and gone, and some return occasionally, but these fonts of wisdom and humor have never ceased to be a source of instruction and amusement. Therefore their devotion was on this occasion rewarded by the presentation of elegant gifts provided by their friends in the club and audience.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

It is generally wise not to talk too much about oneself, but that is what the Liberal Club meets for this evening, and as its friends have been invited to rejoice with us on this occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary, we assume that they will expect to hear us talk of its history, work, objects, and hopes. Social and political organizations, nations, empires, and states come and go in the course of events, their origin and existence depending on the needs and forces which call them into being and maintain them. The Liberal Club was organized to fill a long felt want, and will continue so long as there is need for it. Times change, and with them the requirements of men and the means for satisfying them. There has been great change in the habitat of the Liberal Club in twenty-five years. New York city has expanded wonderfully, and very many of our old-time members have been drawn to far-away districts, to the suburbs, or to other states. But perhaps no less remarkable has been the increase of opportunities to satisfy the demand of progressive people for means of thought exchange. Those who will speak after me know better than I the conditions of twenty-five years ago, but my belief is that the Liberal Club then stood alone in affording a platform for the exposition of new ideas in this city, and that its birth was a sort of spontaneous generation growing out of the need of a Free-thought exchange. Now there are many other outlets for the activity of liberal, progressive thought and the comparison of ideas. Among social organizations there is the Nineteenth Century Club for those who prefer to handle knotty problems with gloved hands; the Twilight Club for those who feel safer to temper the acerbity of debate with the feeling of good fellowship conferred by dining well; the Sunrise Club, on similar lines, but somewhat more bohemian and democratic; besides many other societies for special study or propaganda, such as those of the Socialists, Anarchists, Spiritualists, Theosophists, Single Taxers, Woman Suffragists, and others for the study of social economics, politics, government, municipal reform, etc. While not in direct competition with the Liberal Club, it must be that such societies draw away from it and serve the intellectual and benevolent needs of many active, earnest, and able workers who under the conditions of twenty-five years ago would have found here the best opportunity for advancing their ideas and particular interests. No doubt they are right in thinking they can do more effective work for their chosen causes in the various clubs organized for special work.

It still remains, however, the function of the Liberal Club to afford a free platform and open arena for debating all isms, ologies, and reforms, and those who derive most satisfaction from more practical work in their favorite lines may still find it greatly to their advantage to bring their hobbies here for inspection and criticism, lest they, like blind lovers, fail to discover the defects or unsoundness of their pet fancies. The poet Burns thought it would be a great boon to us if we could see ourselves as others see us. The Liberal Club generally affords the means to that end, though it does not always unhorse the hobby rider or save him from his delusions. It still continues to offer the most free platform or greatest latitude for discussion compatible with order and decency. If these proper limitations are occasionally over-stepped it is better so than that too little truth be told because of an oppressive sense of restraint such as pervades some more élite societies. Furthermore, if the tender sympathies of spectators, with a fellow feeling for a fellow creature, sometimes suffer shock, they will please remember that the sensibilities of the victim are so often anesthetized by his own self-satisfied state of mind that the vivisection is not so cruel as it seems.

The Liberal Club has kept well in the middle of the road; it has not been lured into any narrow path of one-idealism, nor has it adopted any set of principles, articles of faith, creed or platform except the one broad plank of truth for its own sake; we seek truth that makes us free and freedom that makes for truth, and if any point of view or set of ideas has not received fair attention the fault lies with the advocates of such views who have failed to uphold them here. Orthodoxy of the old style had for a long time among us a worthy champion, but it is many years since Herman Shook the dust of our platform from his feet, and no other has come to fill his place and hold the fort for salvation by blood and faith. In many other respects we are unfortunately lacking in the element of diversity which gives zest to debates, and it should be our effort to encourage bright men of diverse opinions to our meetings and our platform. They need us and we need them. The amendment to the constitution just adopted will probably improve, diversify, and enliven the debates, as it will enable us to make associate members with the right to take part in debate of those who have lectured for us acceptably.

Another class to whom we owe much I must speak of as friends, since for reasons best known to themselves they have preferred not to be enrolled on the members' list. Many familiar faces have been seen here oftener than our regular members, and very likely some of them have contributed as much in nickels at the door as members have in dues. Their interest and support on this basis is of course appreciated, but their enrollment as members would add to our importance and strength. Our actual membership looks small in view of the average attendance of about two hundred—souls, some would say: Solons, say I. All in sympathy with our purposes are desired as members, whatever their creed or sex. We would exclude only professional bores, bores, scurrilous and turbulent fellows, and Jesuits, or those who would assume the garb of liberty in order the more easily to destroy it. One of the first mottoes of the Liberal Club, printed on its early certificates of membership, was from Thomas Jefferson—"Error of opinion may be safely tolerated when truth is left free to combat it"—and we hold out the right hand of fellowship to all who will accept it on that basis. It has been and is the real home of "the party of progress," which has been defined as "the one most capable of appreciating and acting on the foremost ideas of this age—which are toleration, respect for work and opinions which differ from one's own, and united action upon a common platform of humanity, irrespective of individual diversity." We can tolerate anyone except the man or party that would scheme to undermine the liberty under which we enjoy existence. We abhor the vacuum which would be left if we were smothered to death by tyrannous creeds.

The Liberal Club has made no alliance except with the American Secular Union, by which we are committed to the nine demands for entire separation of church and state, in accord with the original plans of the fathers of the republic. Acceptance of this principle and continued effort for its maintenance are necessary for self-protection—it is, in fact, our fight for life, for the conditions essential to existence. With God in the Constitution and the agents of the pope or the Women's Christian Temperance Union and the National "Reform" Association piloting or scuttling the ship of state, the political atmosphere would become lethal to the Liberal Club. Nothing just like it ever took root and found suitable soil and favorable air in king-and-priest ridden countries, while here the climate is so favorable that many other such societies are flourishing in large cities. In Mr. Putnam's late book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," he has given quite a long account of all the Liberal organizations in this country, including some that have died out. The first noted in this city was the Free Inquirers' Association, which met at Military hall, in the Bowery, in 1845—fifty years ago. Peter Eckler still lives to tell of it. How long it lived is not reported, and no other is mentioned until the New York Liberal Club was formed in 1869, of which this club is the surviving heir or partner. When a one-celled organism takes up too much new material it is apt to split, or, by a process of fission, become two similar organisms, each partaking of the substance and character of the parent, and thus exhibiting, as Weissman claims, a sort of immortality in the flesh; but, like the two workers in the field, "one may be taken and the other left." All this is typical of what happened to the Liberal Club in 1877, owing to too rapid absorption of incompatible elements. There was a fission into two halves. The other half, long since defunct, took the name, but, as is in evidence this evening, the vital spark and energy, and the nucleus, remained with this branch; so that we are proud to be able to exhibit some of the original substance or several molecules that helped to shape the original body. Of the real active early members, I find that about twenty are still living in this city, and they, together with later comers, have been especially invited to attend this evening.

Mr. Putnam's book shows that more than one hundred societies have been started largely after the plan of this, with similar aims and methods, but he remarks that most of them have adopted Free-thought as the sole issue, giving but little attention to social and economic questions. I think, however, that the more successful and promising ones are like ours in being unlimited in scope and interests. We claim that "the boundless universe is ours" to study and discuss, including all human interests, and no pent-up policy can satisfy our insatiable appetite for new worlds to conquer. Anyone who can aid us to comprehend our relations to the world, or instruct us how to improve our relations to one another, is welcome as speaker, member, or visitor. Like the patent office, we accept the new and useful from whatever source. If we are not easily convinced, we are at least attentive listeners, and that is all the advocate of a new thought can ask for. Our aim is to insure the continuance of this free platform, and our hope that every city and town in the United States shall become liberal and wise enough to establish one like it.

After the president's address Mr. T. B. Wakeman gave a brief outline sketch of the formation of the Club, and showed the certificate signed by Horace Greeley as president and D. T. Gardener as secretary, of membership of one of the oldest members, this certificate and other documents having been presented for the occasion by Professor Bibikof, who was present, as also were Messrs. M. R. Levenson, W. L. Ormsby, Dr. C. S. Weeks, and other pioneers. Mr. Wakeman continued as follows:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I am ordered to say something about "Philosophy of, and at, the Liberal Club." The philosophy of the Liberal Club may be summed up as an interrogation point (?). In that respect the club seems to be unprecedented. Our president, Dr. Foote, has been rummaging ancient and modern times to find its like, but so far in vain, for in the fact that it has no limitation this club may have had no predecessor. Many, indeed, and various have been the societies for debating or discussion for the sake of the exercise or for the amusement to be obtained thereby or for the furtherance of some particular or general views. But the fact of an unlimited thought exchange, per se, on the basis of the furtherance of the truth only, and in which every "transaction shall be a reality," the highest reality the speaker can reach—of that, when and where shall we find the example? The nearest to it our doctor can find seems to be old Socrates himself, who, unluckily for himself, started out in old Athens, some four hundred years before our so called Christ, to knock the nonsense out of people with an interrogation point, or rather by sticking it into them so as to let the stupidity run out as a natural consequence of their efforts to recover from the thrust. But Socrates never lived to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his method, because the recoil of it gave him too severe an intimation of how the vested interests of religion and politics appreciated the unbiased inquiry after truth for truth's sake even in enlightened Greece. Still that effort, though rough on Socrates, was not a failure, as far as Truth was concerned; for he was ever after hailed as the Father of Philosophy and of Philosophers, as thus we read in the lovely words of Milton about Athens:

Of Socrates—see there his tenement—
Whom, well inspired, the oracle pronounced
Wise of Men; from whose mouth issued forth
Mellifluous streams that watered all the schools
Of Academies, old and new.

But then you may sharply ask, If Socrates could not but fail to reach twenty-five years of inquiry after Truth in Athens, "the eye of Greece," how has the Liberal Club, his last and perhaps now his only successor, done that very thing in New York, the mouth of the great American Republic, without being snapped up between its two ponderous jaws of Church and State. We reply that the Liberal Club has been a little wiser and has managed things a little better than Socrates. His way was to practically commit intellectual murder by running his interrogation dagger right into a man and make him cry out and show up his ignorance, stupidity, and lying on the spot. Think of this, and it is a wonder that Socrates lived as long as he did. The Liberal Club does its better work in a better and a wiser way. It asks no questions, but invites "the inquirers after Truth" (and who is not such?) to come upon its platform and show what of it they have or by failure to commit hari kari. This he is willing to try by way of exoneration and proof of the fact that he is a real live Truth Seeker—a real live man, and not the dummy or automaton of some fossil creed or custom.

Now nothing is better for the speaker's health or the growth of the audience, or the welfare and health of the community, than this method of exhibiting live men in action in the pursuit of truth. Nothing tends so forcefully toward real education as this individual and public revelation of what the thinker really is, and what he really stands for. The situation convinces all at once of Goethe's solid maxim, "There is no wisdom save in Truth." Here no other test or criterion but the Truth can be of any possible avail. The speaker, by his position, becomes at once an apostle, and therefore a Seeker after Truth, and a proclaimer of the highest truth he can attain to. Socrates drove and ridiculed people toward the truth; with us they are delighted to seize upon the Truth in self defense, and thus of their own accord become its worshipers. Yet, at the same time, they do not become fanatics or bigots, but rather reconcilers, for the highest truths they can grasp are held up for comparison with the highest that others can reach, and the contrast soon shows that while all may have some, no one can grasp all of the truth at once, and that co-operation in truth seeking is as much a necessity of intellectual, as it is of political and economic progress. Our discussions are not, therefore, ordinary nor technical debates following hair-splitting distinctions, or sticking close to a speaker's set of definitions. We enjoy on the contrary a new and broader statement of higher views of truths, and of their relations, that will knock the debating hair-splitter end wise and make rubbish of his limitations. This contrast with higher views is what sets him free and gets him out of his fencings—out into the glorious clear!—far more than College Education could possibly do. We have heard it said more than once that to stand fight, or even to listen for one year at the Liberal Club, is worth far more than a year at college. And why not, for at most all of the colleges the student is simply intellectually castrated and fenced in under the pretense of being educated. Unless he escapes from college as a rebel he is ruined as far as truth is concerned. At this club you have no fences; you are challenged to use every faculty in its pursuit, and to acquire every truthful means possible to sustain the very jewel of your soul, the highest Truth, Faith, and Ideal you have or can acquire! But why, we repeat, are people ready and even longing to take part in these earnest Contrasts of Views? Let the Liberal Poet Heine answer:

We do not take possession of our ideas, but are possessed by them,
They master us and force us into the arena, where, like gladiators, we must fight for them.

But it is only the nobler souls who feel that must, and have ideas, who are thus forced! The second-hand souls, the echoes, the stupid, the parrots, the automatons have no call to the arena of this platform. But to the men and women of ideas, this club is the only great opportunity they have to find out what those ideas which possess them are really worth in the great market of thought, the progress of the world. And that worth more than anything else do they really need and want to know.

But it is not only those who speak for their ideas in these discussions who are educated by others and thus made charitable towards them. Knowledge, with enlargement of head and heart, like Shakspeare's mercy, is twice blessed. "It blesseth him who gives and him who takes." The audience are also made to see and to feel a world of sincerity of thought, of inquiry, and of research which they can never elsewhere find or enjoy. There is no stimulus to solid and informing reading and study equal to the impulses that go out from the contests of living souls for what they believe to be the highest and the best. Not mere prize-fights, but Cromwell battles for the soul's final hope and trust, make everyone see that his own soul is also upon trial. Then, too, he must be prepared to defend this his highest conviction, for the exigencies of the contest may require him at the front. This feeling that he may be called to speak at any time is a constant mainspring that keeps thought in action as to what then "could or shall I say." No such impulse to thought or education can exist under any other mode of thought exchange.

Nor less has this club been an outlet and a safety valve, and thus a great benefit, to the community. More than once has a noble and devoted soul, possessed, as Heine says, by "an idea" too big for him or out of all possible practicality, had the saving truth of that state of things revealed to him from this platform. No wonder that the superabundant police force of our great city has reached its present idleness and consequent corruption. They have had little to do. The Nihilists, the Anarchists, and the too bumptious Socialists have really been quelled by the many discussions their representatives and ideas have had at the Liberal Club. Their eye-teeth were so effectually drawn here that no serious biting, in America, could be done afterwards. So that the great wave of real reform should be to extend the Liberal clubs and cut down the police; for, as Jefferson said, "Error may be safely tolerated when truth is left free to combat it."

That freedom of combat is the real protection of every Republic. And that Protection is one of the greatest blessings of the Liberal Club to the Public. Truth, or even the search for it, is the great Savior, reconciler, pacificator. That this is its blessing is seen in the general harmony of our Club's history. The qualifications sought for its members and participators have been Love of Truth, ability, order, and decency. These four—no more! Pretty generally have these great indispensables been found constant among us. During its quarter of a century, the Club has black-balled no one, and expelled no one—but one—and he was a Protestant Minister, who could not be convinced by precept or example that "Order is Nature's first Law," to which even the Ministers of Jehovah must submit. So with all that tenderness, with which the good old Angler, Isaac Walton, used to put a worm on his hook, "as though he loved him," this Club was constrained to drop this "child of God" over the breastworks, and we fear that he landed in Hell, for the next thing we heard of him he was furiously agitating for the abolition of that, theologically speaking, most useful institution. Thus even he afterwards continued good Liberal Club-work. But otherwise, there has been needed among us only the gentle intimation of audience or officer that Truth, ability, order, and decency were the real corner-stones of the Club to insure for them the hearty co-operative respect of all. If some things too fresh or broad have sometimes escaped a speaker, the general sense of all have raised the discussion to the higher considerations of that Pure Humanity which covers, absorbs, purifies, and atones for all individual failings and limitations, and thus makes even them the means of our elevation.

Thus our club has done its work, without money or pretense, or patronage or patronizing. It has helped to enlighten, educate, and encourage thousands who have left its walls, and who now represent it in nearly every part of the world. Sister Societies have grown out of its influence and example—and many more should thus grow, until in every city and even village of our Great Republic, there should be a Liberal Club of men and women, inspiring, enlightening, and educating each other. Such clubs may well have the Socratic motto "Know thyself," but also the motto of Diderot, the French Socrates,

Know the True in order to do the Good, let us add—to thyself, and to others! for both in the end are one.

Wilson McDonald followed with one of his lively speeches, which he began with a castigation of the lecturer at the previous session of the Club, and ended with an onslaught on the Lexow Committee, the latter part calling out most decided expressions both of approval and disapproval. He gave several reminiscences of the early days and of the old-timers who ornamented them, contributing, as ever, greatly to the merriment of the meeting.

The president, in a neat and taking speech fairly bubbling over with wit and humor, and actually bristling with puns of excellent quality, sentenced the two charter members, who have continued to take an active interest in the club, to undergo certain punishments which their peculiar and often-repeated offenses seemed to merit. The offenders were Thaddeus B. Wakeman and Wilson McDonald. The former was presented with the Irving edition of Shakspeare, in eight volumes, finest leather and gilt binding, and enjoined to carefully read the same and give the club the benefit of his studies. Mr. McDonald received a large recent work on Greek sculpture, and the "Standard" Dictionary. The commands laid upon him were numerous, and their effect upon the subject will be salutary if he can disentangle them from the puns with which Dr. Foote harnessed them, and render loving obedience thereto. Later in the evening the recipients of these testimonials from their associates gave thanks in speeches which, together with the picture they presented as they stood together on the platform and exchanged the tender compliments with which they are accustomed to deluge each other, added immensely to the hilarity of the occasion and the good nature of the audience. But some allusions to the Lexow Committee by these and another speaker again called out emphatic expressions of dissent, which, however, was not weighted with malice.

The other parts of the entertainment consisted of a soprano solo by Miss Bessie Beckwith, a dialect recitation by Mr. C. Betts, songs by the Kelley Quartette, and juggling by Mr. K. Kalkasa. Encores were in order for all the singers, while the reception accorded to the efforts of Mr. Kalkasa was flattering indeed, especially when the lateness of the hour when he took the floor is considered. It was after eleven o'clock when the audience was dismissed.

News and Notes.

Fargo presents a lively array as it makes preparation for Christmas. There are manifold attractions. The streets are filled; the stores are packed with new and splendid articles; the nights are adorned with entertainments, and so the Free-thought lectures have to enter upon a kind of "struggle for existence." But I have no reason to complain of my Fargo welcome. The Unitarian church was filled each evening. At the first lecture three clergymen were present, and I guess they took it all in, to judge by appearances. They did not look very gloomy or very orthodox, and it may be they will give a reflex of Freethought in their future sermons. It is a fact that the clergymen are learning something, and catch now and then a whiff of progress. They realize that the world is bound to move on.

The Unitarian church of Fargo is now waving its colors triumphantly. It is in the front rank. It has caught on. You might say "it takes the cake," and to the ladies of this heretical parish belongs the credit of this brilliant victory, for better than the most orthodox creed is it to be "in the swim," and every Christian soul desires the same delightful experience. As the Unitarian society is radical to the core and broad as the universe, I am glad of its renown and honor. I wish I had been there at the "innings," but it was the Friday before I arrived. The reverberations, however, of the great event were still in the air, and I could imagine something of what the enchantment might have been. It was a "cake-walk." This was something new to me, and perhaps to my readers; but whatever a cake-walk is it was a "blooming success." There wasn't room in the large hall for the half that desired to attend. Those who couldn't get in and wanted to see had to climb on step-ladders to catch a glimpse of the bewildering magnificence of that checkered scene. There were the mingling flashes of Ethiopian splendors; there was the gorgeous dance, the enlivening melodies and the delicacies that charm the taste. It was a picture of oriental pomp that was certainly worthy of the Western spirit and energy that distinguishes Fargo. The shekels rolled in, of course, and the treasury of the Liberal church glitters with delight—an omen of future progress.

It is pleasant to be among such a live people who have so much courage and invention, who with the polish of Eastern life have the dash and glory of frontier romance. There is nothing dead about Fargo. It pushes through the hard times with a determination to win the "jewel of adversity," and judging by present appearances I guess Fargo will lead the column with colors flying.

I missed the "cake-walk," but as a "thing of beauty is a joy forever," I can still in imagination picture its glowing festivity; but the New England dinner was an intense and glorious reality. I was present at that, which was on Thursday evening, Dec. 20th. I gave my lecture first on "The Religious Conspiracy," and after that sat down to the elegant tables, where about two hundred New Englanders gathered and celebrated the virtues of the past and forgot its crimes. I am indebted to Rev. Helen G. Putnam for an invitation to this delightful banquet, by which my labors at Fargo were closed with a "feast of reason and a flow of soul." Miss Putnam herself read an original poem in honor of the historic Putnam, which was received with great applause; and it was indeed a sparkling delineation of old Connecticut, "Old Put," and the Revolutionary days. All the speeches made on this occasion were worthy of the "Hub" itself. I don't believe that Boston could have had anything better for the occasion. There was wit and wisdom, epigram and humorous story. The songs and the recitations were of the first excellence; and New England certainly can hold her own even upon the plains of Dakota or the golden coast of the Pacific. Well, it does one good to go back to these ancient days, to gather up their precious memories, to recur to the dreams of boyhood, to see in the mind's eye the grand old hills, the beautiful fields, the shining rivers, the rock-bound coast, the glorious ocean. It knits together the ties of comradeship. It makes humanity, all humanity, of every race and clime appear nobler, grander, and fills the heart with hope. It is not only the celebration of New England, but of every native land which is dear to every wanderer, and which can never be forgotten wherever we go, over land and sea; for we are born of this earth, and we shall never find anything more beautiful than its hearthstones and its homes.

So, every way, Fargo was a rich experience in the secular journey; and my trip into Dakota has been altogether delightful. There was not a storm during the whole time, and nothing to prevent good attendance at the lectures. It is fortunate that winter has opened so mildly and brilliantly. It will do much to ease up the hard times. Some of the days have been so sunshiny and beautiful that hardly any fire was needed. Certainly winter has never presented a panorama more gorgeous, with more varied beauty of sun and stars and moon, and golden dawn and evening and brilliant azure; and nature and humanity have mingled in animated forms. The hundred friends and more that I have met have given a zest to the work which words can not define. Broader and nobler than ever outrays the path of human effort.

Just as I left Fargo a bit of storm and blizzard did come and I had a taste of what might be. But it was too late to do any damage to the Pilgrim. He was safe on the cars and could watch the roaring elements as he could a caged wild beast. Soon, however, the golden sunlight came again; the dark clouds rolled off, and a serene and resplendent day attended my journey to the East.

If I should mention all the good friends of Free-thought at Fargo, I should not know where to stop. There are many of them. It is not the name, but the reality that I will celebrate now—the genuine hospitality which makes Fargo not only to myself, but to every stranger, a very attractive rendezvous, as I have noted in my former letters, and I must express my thanks to those who have so brightened my labors. Freethought does have its reward in this world when it meets with such splendid fellowship.

I leave Fargo Friday morning, December 21st, and not until Saturday noon do I arrive at my next point, St. Charles, Minn. Of course the moment I see my stalwart friend Mr. B. Peabody, I know that I am in for a good campaign at this place. St. Charles is, indeed, a notable battle ground. Our flag has floated here for many a day. Reynolds, Remsburg, Bell, Walker, Mrs. Krekel, and lastly Steiner, have been here, and the community has been pretty well educated in Freethought. I give my lecture Saturday evening in the Opera House. The clergymen are not present, as I hoped they would be, to enter the lists. Only one man ventured to make any opposition to my discourse on the "Rights of Man." He admitted that I was about correct; and he was in favor of a free Sunday. They can play baseball, if they want to, he said, only they must not make so much noise as to disturb religious worship. I replied, "That is right for your side, and we only insist that the churches also shall not make so much racket on Sunday as to disturb baseball playing. What is fair for church, is fair for baseball."

He said also that when a Freethinker dies he must not sneak around and ask an orthodox clergyman to preach his funeral sermon. I perfectly agreed with him. We don't need a clergyman to bury us, and the true Freethinker will never "sneak" in order to get the orthodox blessing over his grave. He knows it will do him no good. He will sleep just as well, and have no trouble or pain without prayers and sermons, as with them. But the fact is that the orthodox force themselves in and insist upon conducting the funerals of Freethinkers. It gives them a chance to scatter the good old doctrine of hell fire. And furthermore, when Freethinkers do insist upon their rights, and bury a friend in a simple and beautiful manner, meeting death with courage, covering the grave with flowers, avoiding the horror, and remembering the virtues of the dead as an inspiration to the living, then orthodox bigotry is sure to insult us by saying that our friend is "buried like a dog," when, in truth, we have given the sweetest tokens of affection of which the human heart is capable.

On Sunday morning I went to hear the Rev. Mr. Smith, a quite Liberal Methodist clergyman; in fact, I think he is almost too Liberal for his cloth. He is not at all dogmatic; is an Agnostic about many things; didn't insist upon the historic truth of Christianity—on the contrary said that the only true religion was the "religion of good will;" that the only way to give glory to God was to love and help our fellowmen. In short, he gave a right good Freethought discourse, only it was a little bit too sentimental. He rather made the heart the guide of the reason. Dreams are good things, he said; they make us happy whether true or false. If they are beautiful dreams, rejoice in them; only reject the bad dreams. Mr. Smith is of an imaginative and poetic temperament and takes religion in the soft colors of fancy rather than in the rigid lines of dogma. It was quite a pleasure to listen to him. He likes Plato about as well as he likes Jesus, and revels in the "divine philosophy" of the old Greek. He also has a touch of Emerson, and he finds refuge from the harsh problems of life in the transcendental school, where the perplexities of theology dissolve in the rosy colors of philosophical romance. He is too much of a poet to be a dogmatist, and his imagination is so vivid that I guess it gets the better of his reason, and he forgets facts and indulges in visions. I am sorry he didn't come to my lectures. I think I could have straightened him out and given him some solid stuff to mingle with his fantasies. But he was on the sick list and the weather was somewhat uncertain, so he is excusable. I think he will get on our side one of these days, for he is evidently a man of convictions and not afraid to speak his honest thought.

I lectured Sunday afternoon and evening to good audiences. The skies were lowering, but no storm appeared. St. Charles has been all that I could expect. Mr. B. Peabody has labored here for years. He has a large family, three boys and three girls, all Freethinkers. Now he has a grandchild, and that is a Freethinker, I know. I don't see a bit of orthodoxy about the shining face. I enjoy the hospitality of Mr. Peabody's delightful home. Music fills the intervals of labor. I also enjoy the fireside of Mr. and Mrs. L. Knapp, Sunday evening and Monday, where I am writing these News and Notes, while the gray mists stretch away over the fields and woods, and the wind whistles; but Christmas is coming, the good old pagan festival; the sun is beginning to turn on his mighty course, and even amidst wintry desolation we can hear the songs of birds far away in the blooming of the springtime. No wonder our ancestors hailed with joy the glorious and golden Apollo, as he wheeled northward on his effulgent path. No wonder the flames burned high as they filled the Christmas tree with happy omens and the Yule log sparkled like gold.

Among the many friends at St. Charles besides those already mentioned are John H. Davis, Wm. Thomas, George Smith, Everett Jonsson and S. A. Johnson, George Wheelock, Fred Lynstead, Sol Southwick, George James, R. A. Battis, Ammon Oleson, Wm. Hesselgrave, Lyman Cox, Jas. Holt, Eric Erickson, L. J. Patterson, J. E. Scott, and others. Mr. Gwin, of Byron, from a distance of twenty-seven miles, was also present—a staunch comrade, and standing on the picket line. I can not mention all that belong to the grand army of Freethought at St. Charles. It is in fact one of the best places I have visited, and a large number of names have been added to the Freethought Federation.

I am glad that THE TRUTH SEEKER is pushing the work of secularization in New York, and preparing for a big fight on the Sunday question. I hope it will be amply supported in this rally for Free-thought. Our campaign pamphlet, "Federation and Union," is about ready. Send in the orders; circulate widely.

My next letter will be from New Mexico.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Campaign Book.

I have the pleasure to acknowledge the following contributions for "Federation and Union," the report of our last congress: B. A. Shaw, 25 cents; K. T. Gryte, $1. I hope that others will send in their names and subscriptions. The book will soon be out, and should be handed to thousands to read. It will surely result in great good, and help our cause immensely. But we must urge our friends to help circulate it. It contains the names of all the donors to the last congress, as well as the reports of secretary and treasurer, all the speeches of our leading lecturers, and other valuable matter. Subscriptions will be reported weekly.

We Are Simply Defending Ourselves.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Dec. 11, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith I hand $1.50 to apply on my subscription to the fearless champion of justice and human liberty. Go on in your glorious fight. Yours is true courage. You deserve all the reward that can be given to the true humanitarian and patriot.

I regret that I cannot send you more money, but the gold bugs and tariff reformers have killed all kinds of business in Missouri.

Is there Liberty Under Christianity?

Dec. 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find list of forty names. Please send to each one copy of Paine's "Age of Reason," as per offer in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Inclosed is $5 to pay for same. Hope it will do some good, and if you continue your missionary scheme with other Liberal literature I will probably send you other orders this winter. Please acknowledge receipt of this order through THE TRUTH SEEKER, only leave out the address and my name. I am not in a position to have it known, but hope to see the day when an Infidel's opinion will be respected the same as the Christian's. We live in a town where ninety-nine out of the hundred are God's people and, being in business, cannot afford to make enemies.

Yours for liberty,

Only One Chance for the Clergy.

NEW HARTFORD, IA., Dec. 17, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I have my copy of the colonel's new lecture started on its mission of humanity. When it is worn out I will do as I have done with "Men, Women, and Gods," "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" "John's Way," "Age of Reason," and others—send and get more. I have caused to be worn out two copies of the first, three of the third, and the third copy of "Age of Reason" is now pretty well fingered. A man brought the "Age of Reason" home last night, remarking that it was the worst dose the Bible had ever got, and wanted to know if the clergy had ever answered it? I told him attempts had been made in that direction, but never an answer that was satisfactory even to the clergy themselves.

If the world continues in progression the sky pilots will anchor, as a last resort, to the "Age of Reason's" "One God and no more," and a "hope for happiness beyond this life." If they don't want that "one God" to raise "hell," progress will not be impeded.

DAY, KAN., Dec. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As one of the lecturers of the Kansas Freethought Association I wish to say to Freethinkers that I shall devote the most of my time during the next year to lecturing and distributing Freethought literature. My teaching keeps me at present within fifty miles of home. I have quite a number of lectures to deliver during holidays. Alexander Rose, of Lawrence, one of the Kansas Freethought Association lecturers, was here a short time ago and delivered several lectures which made the pious pour out their slanders on all who dare to think for themselves. Yet they dare not debate the question with a Freethinker, although I have debated with them, but one dose is all they can stand; they will never attempt it the second time.

We organized a Freethought society at Ballard Falls, this county, the 1st of last February with fourteen members; we now have some fifty. Since then we issued a small leaflet entitled "Lesson Leaves, or the Bible in a Nutshell," which contains more than one hundred absurd and tyrannical verses from the Bible, and shows where in that book may be found four hundred indecent and silly passages. The leaflets will be sent to any address for five cents a dozen.

You will please find inclosed $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year; it is the best church killer in existence—I cannot do without it. Also send me the $2.75 Freethought badge pin. I think lecturers should wear a badge, and as many others as can afford to do so, in order to show their colors. When my school is out I shall try to get subscribers for your paper.

Yours, in the cause of right,

JAMES PONTIUS.

The Sabbath of Constantine, Not of Jesus.

VINELAND, N. J., Dec. 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am very glad to see that the common-sense people of New York have petitioned the legislature for the repeal of the Sunday law of the state, but if the professed Christians followed Jesus, as they profess to do, there would be no need for such petitions, for there never would have been any Sunday Laws in New York. There is nothing plainer in the New Testament than that Jesus abolished the Jewish Sabbath eighteen hundred years ago, calling it a Jewish wine-bottle. The Jews had two kinds of wine-bottles, material and spiritual. The material wine-bottles, in which old Noah and other Bible toppers put the wine on which they got drunk, were made of the skins of animals. A new bottle or skin being filled with new wine and tied up tight, the wine began to work and the skin stretched and gave it room to work. If that wine, after it had worked, was poured out and the bottle was filled again with new wine and tied up tight, when the wine began to work the bottle would not stretch any more to give it room, but would burst and the wine would be spilt, and the bottle perish. The Sabbath was one of their spiritual wine-bottles, and Jesus, by comparing it to the old skin bottles that would burst if used the second time, showed that the Sabbath had stretched down through the Jewish dispensation and we had no use for it in this new age of the world. I have worked as much on Sunday, all my life, as on other days; during the sixteen years that I published my Pleasure Boat I wrote as much for it, and corrected proof as much as on any other day, and my printers worked on Sunday. Jesus said the day was made for man and not man for the day. And now let all Sunday laws be abolished, and let every man work as he pleases if he does others no harm. Read the first part of Mark, and if I mistake not there is another place in the Testament where Jesus reproves his disciples for observing Sunday, and worshipping new moons, which worship was another of their spiritual wine-bottles that had stretched enough. J. HACKER.

A Hard Task for the Gods.

NEW YORK, Dec. 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I take for my text a clause of a truism from the writings or sayings of Colonel Ingersoll to the effect that man can never settle the problems of origin and destiny. What I write will pertain principally to the subject of origin.

It is impossible that anything ever was or ever can be created. Let us imagine a certain extent of space, as a cubic foot, cubic rod, a cubic mile—or even infinitesimal space with nothing whatever in it—merely pure space in utter darkness and nothing anywhere to cause motion or to obstruct a body moving in any direction. Now, if we accept the creation theory, we must suppose the above described condition at one time existed, and the closing or termination of that condition or period was the beginning of material things.

By some means which we cannot understand or explain, and which a God himself could not understand or explain, we must suppose that he himself, without being created by anybody or anything, and without being made out of anything, appeared; he simply appeared suddenly within the vacuum, without home or country and with nothing upon which to rest. Now, with no material whatever to work with, nothing to create anything out of, how would it be possible for such a being to make something out of nothing, unless he used the material out of which he himself was made, and if he did that, then it was not creation, but a process of manufacturing? For, in order that anything can be created, it must be made out of nothing. When something is made out of other material, the new formation becomes merely a manufactured article, in which case it is not created.

Now, in regard to the supposition of a miraculous and sudden appearance of a God within the pure space, when there had previously existed nothing but space, such appearance would be impossible. To theorize in such a way would be an absurdity. It would be still more impossible for nothing to begin with to create itself out of nothing. And right here is the perplexity with which the apologists of the creation theory for the existence of things must contend. If the above queries cannot be answered—and they cannot be answered within the range of material things and human thought and experience—then the religionists have succeeded in duping their fellow beings ever since the creation theory was promulgated. I fearlessly lay this down as a rule: There never was and never can be anything created. Place a whole tribe of gods in the midst of a perfect vacuum and tell them to create an atom, and if they continued to remain in such vacuum throughout time, they would still have their task to perform. Say nothing about one God creating many millions of worlds, a myriad of gods could not create one infinitesimal part of an atom. I repeat: If created, they would have to make it out of absolutely nothing; if made from something else, it would be manufactured, not created.

One thought further. There are sixty-four chemical elements, or different kinds of substances, such as iron, gold, and hydrogen, which have never been separated into two or more different kinds of substances. Now, it is the study of the leaders in the science of chemistry to try to separate these sixty-four elements, so as to reduce them all to one common origin. It may be possible for this to be done. We will suppose it can be done. Then there would be but one basic element, possibly ether, as some scientists think may be the case. We will suppose to create a particle of ether (or the basic element) to be the task set before the gods in the midst of a pure vacuum. They have got to create it from space, minus everything material or immaterial. Could it be done? The only answer is "No," unless it is possible for an impossibility to be performed; and if performed it would not be an impossibility. To illustrate: It is impossible to make the sum of one plus one equal anything but two. Such sum could not be made to equal three nor any number but two without performing an impossible act or operation. Consequently the only logical conclusion is that all existing matter was never created and has always existed; not a particle of matter can be destroyed and not a new particle of basic matter can be added to the present mass.

Scientists can reduce chemical elements to a common origin, and there all knowledge must end in the direction of origin, and we must content ourselves with the unsatisfactory consolation that the mystery of the true origin of one particle of ethereal entity can never be explained, unless the basic entity can be still further reduced until it becomes nothing, the demonstration of which would prove that we, ourselves, are nothing and do not exist.

And as to the destiny of a particle of ethereal entity, since it cannot be destroyed, it is consequently destined to exist throughout all time.

Hence, the truthfulness of my text.

From Captain Otto Thomson.

STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN, Dec. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: This year is now almost gone. It has been a very stirring one for Freethought abroad. In particular in America and England the movement has been very energetic and bids fair for the future. Discouraging as is the present state of Freethought in Sweden, and sorrowful and suffering as is my own situation, it has been very cheering to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and the London Freethinker, kindly forwarded to me in my loneliness by my foreign Freethought friends. You may be sure that the most lively interest follows your Freethought movement abroad, and I hardly believe there is any other one of my countrymen who cares so much about it as I do. By a great many unhappy circumstances and inconsiderate actions the Freethought movement in Sweden came to discredit, and most of its reliable and respectable members were forced to absent themselves and keep aloof awaiting better times, and this has brought the movement to an end.

The so-called new "Fretankare Förbundet," in Stockholm, lives still, but it can do nothing for want of a capable leader and for lack of pecuniary assistance. They have no one capable of carrying on an interesting propaganda, and must accordingly sooner or later dissolve. Unpromising as the present state of Freethought is in Sweden, it is far from dead. I am convinced it will revive with redoubled force and energy when the present unhappy obstacles are removed. I am certain that whenever the field is cleared of old encumbrances a new leader will appear, perhaps when least expected, and display the Freethought banner anew, and former interested and worthy Freethought champions will hasten under its folds again and renew the battle and regain the place the Swedish Freethought movement once had in the international army of Freethought. To be boycotted as I was by former friends, and brought to my present unhappy and suffering situation, and coldly ignored by my countrymen as I have been, has grieved me very much. The only one who stood by me was a very poor friend, Mr. E. P. Yanson; he did what he could, and tried to interest more affluent persons, but his endeavors were frustrated by those who ought to have been foremost in procuring me help. There is another friend, a young Swedish-American with whom I corresponded when he was a resident of Moline, Ill. He returned to Sweden a year and a half ago and lives in the country at his mother's. His name is K. Y. Ellington, and perhaps you remember his name, for he has had sundry articles published in THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Investigator. He is a self-instructed young thinker, and what you Americans call a thorough Liberal, not, as I believe, a fanatic Socialist. He wrote several articles and sent to the Fritänkaren, but Mr. Lennstrand did not publish all, as Ellington told me; those published I considered very good, and I heard others found them so. We have corresponded all the time, and at midsummer this year became personally acquainted when he made a recreation trip to Stockholm and called on me in my ignoble residence. We became very intimate, and our correspondence becoming now more unreserved, he has shown me much kindness and sympathy. He has endeavored to cheer me, and in every possible manner to revive hope for the future. Mentally he has to a great extent succeeded in getting me to look on the dark and gloomy present with comparative equanimity. He is one who will join a new Freethought movement in the beginning, and take the lead if no other one dares to do it, when he can count upon reliable co-operation and support. He says of himself to me: "I am no scholar. I have no so-called scholastic training, but I have gone through some very hard classes in the school of practical life, and from a mere boy I have been a book-worm and studied the works of the most renowned English and American thinkers and philosophers, and am known in several of the Liberal associations in the States." I do not know if he is as good an orator as writer. In any case he will be a good assistant or editor when a new Freethought paper can be started in Sweden.

I have no news to forward. I tried to instruct my fellow sufferer, the old crippled sailor, Mr. Ullström, who went to America, to Staten Island, to call upon you. I told him to tell you all I knew about the Swedish Freethought movement and its leading men. By letter he informed me that he was very kindly received by you, and that he had a long talk with you.

In September a notice appeared in a Stockholm paper that Mr. Lennstrand was very ill and was at the "Serafiner Lazarett" in Stockholm, and it was feared he could scarcely live a month longer. I went to the Lazarett and called upon the doctor to assure me of the real state of my former friend and found, as I suspected, the notice was by far too exaggerated. The doctor told me he is sick, but not at present alarmingly. His sickness is of the kind that reappears at intervals, and how it will at last turn out I cannot now foretell. A fortnight afterwards I heard he had left the infirmary as incurable, and that he had taken private lodging somewhere in Stockholm, and had not been heard of after that.

I have seen in THE TRUTH SEEKER that

Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" has left the press and is very much admired by Ingersoll, Charles Watts, and others. I have not given up my hope to get my translation of Mr. Putnam's "Religion a Lie," etc., published, and I hope then to gain enough so that I can get "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," else I do not know how to get it.

My best wishes to yourself, and a happy Yule. Please forward these well-wishings to Mr. Putnam and those other American friends who still remember their unhappy friend and disabled fellow Freethought champion. Do not consider me forward in asking you to continue to send me your much cherished and admired paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, if you can do it without inconvenience.

Yours sincerely and gratefully,
OTTO THOMSON.

Christianity and the Social Evil.

MILFORD, MASS., Dec. 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $9 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for myself and Henry Willard, and twelve copies of Ingersoll on the "Bible" to me. It is snowing fast as I sit and watch the devotees going to church; seven out of ten are women. All religions have agreed in making woman inferior, and yet she has cheerfully acknowledged her submission to the priest. As I see them paddling through the snow can I do less than think of what the pious fathers said of woman? What more can I do? I can tell of a few cases. St. Bernard said: "Woman is the organ of the devil;" St. John Damascene: "Woman is a daughter of falsehood, a sentinel of hell, the enemy of peace; through her, Adam lost paradise." There is no need to multiply—they were nearly all of the same ilk. Saladin in summing up as to woman says: "She is the nearest to an angel we are ever likely to see; but in believing that the Bible and Christianity have been her friend, she is the nearest to a fool that it is possible for the mind of man to conceive." The Jewish Ritual-Benediction said: "Blessed art thou, O eternal our God, that thou hast not made me a woman." What said Paul, 1 Cor. vii, 34, 36: "But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely toward his virgin, if she pass the flower of her age and need so require, let him do what he will, he sinneth not; let them marry." If he had gone to the bottom of that bottomless pit, once believed in, he could not have found a worse doctrine; and yet there are (I had almost said men) priests so devoid of all sense of decency and equality as between man and woman, that they hold up Paul as a paragon of virtue and morality to woman, whom he has so shamefully maligned. The fact that woman will work to uphold his memory, or even listen to fulsome praise of him, only shows what centuries of degradation in the name of the Lord have accomplished. Very likely Frances Willard has read the above injunction from Paul to the unmarried. She is one of them. What thoughts did she have after reading it? Any reading that is not supplemented by thought has been to little purpose. It shows what thought she had, if any, after such filthy stuff had been read, by her efforts to have the book that contains it, and worse, read in the public schools to help the young out of troubles for which that Paul had a remedy. Miss Willard thinks the living pictures are doing a great deal to continue the social evil! Mrs. Grannis, head of the Social Purity League of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, thinks that the living pictures are not immodest. Grammarians differ, and why not Willard and Grannis? Lady Somerset is in line with Miss Willard as to the effects of the living pictures as to increasing the social evil. I think of what another English woman, Lady Montague, said: "It goes far toward reconciling me to being a woman, when I reflect that I am thus in no danger of marrying one."

Lady Somerset can say: It goes far toward reconciling me to the living pictures when I reflect that I am in no "danger" of being one, thereby increasing the social evil. A Bristol (England) daily says: "Lady Somerset, the English head of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, owns many houses, and twelve of them contain saloons." Comment is unnecessary. Official records of the chief of police and excise commissioners of New York in 1878 show that the houses of Trinity Church contained 96 places of prostitution—92 white and 4 colored. Yet Trinity Church is exempted from taxation because it is a "bulwark of morality." The social evil, it seems, had pre-empted the city before living pictures were born. Let us see how Christianity in India has tended to elevate woman and the purity of social relations. I condense from "Woman: Her Glory, Her Shame, and Her God," by Saladin: "In the Indian regiments every soldier must be permitted to marry, and to have his wife with him. In the Christian regiments in India very few are permitted to have a wife. A Christian regiment marches from one station to another, accompanied by say two dozen wives and 300 harlots, paid for by the Christian rate-payers in England here—paid for by men who go to church to thank God that they are not as other men. The Queen's printer has a license to print the Bible and he has a contract from her majesty's stationery office to print for the horse guards certain schedules. When a British regiment in India moves from one station to another, these schedules are in use. This schedule leaves spaces in which the different requirements of the regiments are to be filled in; for instance, at the top of one column is 'provisions;' another, 'horses;' another, 'fodder;' another, 'prostitutes;' all printed by the Queen's printer, 'by her majesty's most gracious command.' The number of prostitutes the regiment requires is filled in by the surgeon; and if the specified number be not readily obtained, procuresses are sent out to recruit for heathen victims to Christian lust, and to lure from the daughters of the Orient that which is above all price, with the glitter of English gold. In a Christian regiment the prostitute is as indispensable as the chaplain, and the brothel as essential as the church." Every woman—Willard, Grannis, and Somerset not excepted—ought to read "Woman: Her Glory, Her Shame, and Her God." Sold by the Truth Seeker Company.

CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

[We presume that friend Johnson perceives that this "doctrine" of Paul's which he condemns is the doctrine that marriage is an evil in itself, but it is preferable to relations outside of marriage. In the passage quoted Paul simply says that he who marries does not sin if necessity requires the marriage, but that it is better that both the man and woman remain single and serve the Lord, which he assumes they can do better if they do not marry. The entire chapter is an earnest entreaty for the brethren not to marry if they can possibly "contain." Verses 32, 33, and 34 show with perfect clearness that Paul was not advocating prostitution, but advising his brethren to marry only when they felt that they could not remain away from women. He thought that marriage would distract their attention from heavenly things, and the feeling of Paul has animated Christians in all ages of the world since his time. "He that is unmarried careth for the things of the Lord, how he may please the Lord; but he that is married careth for the things of the world, how he may please his wife. There is difference also between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit; but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband."—ED. T. S.]

"An Explanation" Explained.

TO THE SECULARISTS OF OREGON: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 24th Charles Hagner, of Portland, asks "space to correct a statement made by Katie Kehm Smith, secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union, in her report of the last convention." He says: "I refer to the following sentence: 'The convention assumed the indebtedness incurred by Charles Hagner and others.'" Then he says: "The injustice consists in mentioning my name alone as the party who contracted the bill." Is it possible there is another scholar (besides Charles Hagner) in Oregon who would construe the phrase "Charles Hagner and others" as mentioning him alone?

But further on he calls it "my bill." He says: "I sent men to do the work, furnished provisions for the same, the nails and other things needed; to do this, I advanced the money out of my own pocket, part of which I had to borrow."

And when I brought in my bill ($72) before the convention," etc. So it was his bill and he was the party who contracted it. Again he says: "So far the executive committee has not turned over one dollar to me on account of the bill."

If it was not his bill, what right has he to complain that not a dollar has been turned over to him? If it was his bill, why does he complain because other names are not mentioned? Any person who understands the use of our language would naturally inquire, What does Charles Hagner want, anyway? It is difficult to find out from what he has written. Again, he says that "truth and justice are two of the fundamental principles of Freethought," then he writes with the object of making Oregon Secularists believe that he is truthful and just, but that W. W. Jesse, president of the Union; Katie Kehm Smith, secretary; D. W. Smith and the executive committee are not. He says: "I had four of said committee with me all the time."

Why does he suppress the name of the fourth one? Does that one indorse his censure of the rest? Has he that one with him now?

Let me cross-examine Charles Hagner a little and see how truthful and just he really is:

"Mr. Hagner, you were at the convention?" "I was."

"Is not the following a full and true copy, verbatim et literatim, of the paper presented by you to the convention, and which you call "my bill"?"

"It is."

"Did any vouchers accompany this paper?" "No."

"What is the deficit shown, which you asked the convention to assume?" "72.60."

[The paper shows two items chargeable to the grounds—nails and expenses of men, $61.85. It also shows he received in donations $36.15, so that instead of $72.60 his bill should not have been more than $25.70, and before he wrote to THE TRUTH SEEKER he had received $70 more, five from Hon. J. H. Schroeder and five from himself.]

"Now state how much money was raised at the convention." "$90.08."

"How much of this sum was subscribed and paid to apply on Wheeler's lumber bill?" "$40.50."

"Was any more subscribed for that purpose?" "Yes; I subscribed $5, but I never paid it. I paid it to myself on 'my bill.'"

"Did any one authorize you to do this?" "No."

"How much of the $90.08 was paid in specially for Liberal papers for the secretary's office?" "$8.50."

"What bill was first ordered paid by the convention?" "The secretary's bill for money advanced by her for postage for the Union, amounting to $19.70."

"How much was left of the $90.08 after deducting these three items?" "$21.38."

"What was next ordered paid?" "The estimates for necessary supplies for the ensuing year $84 20; $50 to the secretary for services during the last year, and estimates for inclosing the Park building and fixing grounds, to be paid out of any funds not otherwise appropriated."

"What was the last allowance made by the convention?" "It accepted 'my bill,' and ordered it paid by the secretary as soon as funds are collected, unless otherwise appropriated."

"How much of the $90.08 was left unappropriated to pay it?" "Nothing."

"How much has come into the treasury since that time?" "I do not know, if anything."

"Since you had full knowledge of how the money was appropriated—knew that there was none left to apply on 'my bill,' and do not know if any has come into the hands of the secretary since to apply on it—how can you be truthful or just, and publish to the world that 'so far the executive committee has not turned over one dollar to me on account of the bill,' plainly insinuating that they, or some of them, had misapplied the money of the Union, and done you an injustice?"

Now that Oregon Secularists may know more about this steamboat-excursion claim, permit me to say: The excursion was not the result of a desire to improve the park, but the improvements of the park were the result of a desire to have the excursion to that place. The deed to the park was executed June 9th. The excursion took place July 4th.

The park was unimproved, and everybody who could volunteered to help put it in shape for the excursion, which was gotten up solely for the recreation of the members of the First Secular Church of Portland, and for the benefit of that church, it being its second annual excursion.

Mr. Hagner was very enthusiastic about making enough money out of the excursion to more than meet expenses, and if he had the Portland Secular Church would have received the surplus, not the Oregon State Secular Union. There was no thought at this time of holding the Oregon State Secular Union responsible for a possible deficit, and there was a deficit according to Mr. Hagner's book-keeping. This greatly worried him, and he sent out a circular letter to the Secularists of Oregon for help—either money or produce; the result was, according to his showing, $21.90. Evidently the Secularists of Oregon thought that if the Secularists of Portland wanted a steamboat excursion, they better pay for it.

Finally he thought the Oregon State Secular Union might assume the debt, because some work had been done on the park, and it good-naturedly did so—steamboat and all. As soon as the convention assumed the indebtedness Mr. Hagner came to me and wanted part of the money subscribed to pay Wheeler's bill. I would not consent to this, and he has been showing his teeth at me ever since.

The executive committee requested Mr. Hagner to furnish the secretary with a complete statement of money received and paid out, names of persons having unpaid claims, the amount due each and what for, so as to enable her to know what bills to pay. To this he replied, October 27th, refusing "to make out any further statement," adding that he "may as well explain to those to whom we are indebted that there was only enough money raised at the convention to pay the salary of the secretary, and what we owed her from last year," etc. And there is where the matter stands now.

I wish to add that Mr. Hagner did not "send the men;" they came voluntarily; donated their work, with exception of carpenters paid by Mr. Hicketheir; and further, that nearly all the provisions were donated by friends, through the personal efforts of Mrs. Smith and Miss Olds.

Respectfully,
D. W. SMITH,
Third Vice-Pres. O. S. S. U.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Merry Jack Frost.

Jack Frost made a picture fair and bright
There were castles and towers dazzling white,
And people and trees as plain as plain.
All spread on the nursery window pane.

Jack Frost stood by and laughed to see
How the children clapped their hands in glee,
And he cried, "Yes, look at it while you may,
Lest it should not be here another day."

A Liberal Young People's Paper.

Now 'tis the spring and weeds are shallow rooted;
Suffer them now and they'll outgrow the garden.
And choke the herbs for want of husbandry.
—Shakspeare.

I have just finished reading Mrs. Johnston's well-written letter to the Children's Corner, December 22d. And observing her praiseworthy interest in the children's cause, I was particularly attracted by the following lines: "I think there ought to be not only a Children's Corner, but a paper for children. As we have no such paper, I want to see parents and children take hold and at least show that they are interested and consequently write to ask if there is anything I can do to assist in that line." That is the right kind of sentiment. Just what we ought to hear from every intelligent parent to whom the welfare of his or her children is of prime importance. We want to see the future generation liberal-minded, well educated, fearless, and Freethinkers. And now is our time for action. Human advancement was never gained through passivity. Happiness was never found in stagnation. Teach the children truth and impress upon them the meaning of those grand words, so fraught with earnest significance: "Liberty, equality, and fraternity;" never neglecting Thomas Paine's splendid sentiment, "Universal mental liberty." Let us not neglect the opportunities so significantly indicated in Mrs. Johnston's words: "Children brought up to think will think, and there is little danger of 'Christians stealing our children' if we do not put our children under their influence."

There could be no better way of safeguarding them than by placing literature in their hands encouraging Freethought. There are plenty who are able, willing, and ready to fill such waiting minds with gems of intellectual wisdom, and who could make a Liberal paper bright with contributions. So, sure of our writers, we lack only sufficient support. What! this in a country where St. Nicholas, Youth's Companion, and other secular literature for young people find such ready encouragement? Let us patronize comrades and "home industries." If necessary drop your subscription to the above magazines, and take our Liberal Young People's Paper. Because our readers of the Corner appreciate the significance of divesting the church of authority and promoting freedom, I can, even now, hear their ready acquiescence. Therefore, let Miss Wixon prepare a blank for subscriptions to the Young People's Paper, after announcing its subscription rates through her familiar columns of the Corner, and see how many Freethinkers are on hand to strike one last decisive blow against superstition and bigotry, enabling the Liberal Young People's Paper to be a thing of the present and not of the future. Yes, Mrs. Johnson, you may help in "booming the Children's Corner." Let us hear from you again. In sympathy of thought,

BELLEVUE, KY., Dec. 9, 1894.
DEAR MISS WIXON: I have been reading the Children's Corner, and thought I would write you a letter. My name is Nellie Held. I am ten years old. I have one brother. We both go to school. I am in the third reader. I got a certificate of honor last year and I am trying to get another this year. My papa is a Free-thinker and takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. We have a large picture of Thomas Paine. If you think my letter is good enough, I would feel very proud to see it in the Children's Corner. NELLIE J. HELD.

ASHLAND, PA., Dec. 9, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I often see THE TRUTH SEEKER, and find it very nice to read the Children's Corner. I am eleven years old and go to school every day. I have a brother who goes to Kutztown street Normal school, and he must depend on an education for a living because he has only one hand. I think there are some awful pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but they must be true, because our neighbor, Mr. Theobald, who gets it, and others have some great arguments about it. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER has the best of the argument. Your friend, KATIE TREON.

[Dear Katie: Read, listen, study, and learn all you can; use your reasoning faculties. Think, reflect, meditate. Be faithful and truthful, and you will always come out right. Kind regards to your brother. He may yet do more good with his one hand than fifty men with one hundred hands. —Ed. C. C.]

ANDOVER, KAN., Dec. 8, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. I read the Corner every week. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper I ever read. We live two miles from Andover. I have one brother and two sisters. My brother's name is Frank, and my eldest sister's name is Lottie, and my other sister's name is Chloe. I am eleven years of age. I study geography, spelling, grammar, history, writing, and physiology at school. Our school-house is about two miles from our house. I belong to a society, the name of which is Social Science Union. We meet every two weeks. We have a meeting to-night. I get pieces for the society out of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would like to correspond with some of the little Freethinkers. Your Liberal friend,

The times are hard, but there always seem to be opportunities for those who are willing to work. In the past month I have made $175 above all expenses, selling Climax Dish Washers, and have attended to my regular business besides. I never saw anything that gave as general satisfaction. One should not complain where they can make over $6 a day, right at home. I have not canvassed any, so anxious are people for Climax Dish Washers, that they send after them; any lady or gentleman can do as well as I am doing, for anyone can sell what everyone wants to buy. I think we should inform each other through the newspapers of opportunities like this, as there are many willing to work if they knew of an opening. For full particulars, address the Climax Mfg. BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the Church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

At the Book Table.

Until the appearance of Mr. Vickers's book* the English speaking peoples have been without any adequate history of that country of Middle Europe which, probably more than any other of equal area and population, deserves their gratitude for the great sacrifices it has made in behalf of the cause of civil and religious liberty, and for the share it had in keeping alight the flame of hope through the dark night of oppression. The land of John Hus, it was ravaged by the ruthless destroyers who slaughtered under the black flag of the church, and tyrannized over by the princes and kings of alien races. We have in the United States many tens of thousands of the children of Bohemia, and among them are hundreds, thousands, who are of the Freethought army, ever at the front in defense of the liberties for which their forefathers fought so gallantly.

It must have been a herculean labor to gather the materials for this History. The sad land of which it tells had for ages been almost lost to view; the national spirit seemed to have been extinguished in the seething waters of despotism, and the very name had come to be understood more as a metonym for literary vagabondage than as designating the dwelling place of a great nation. But the connection of several members of that nation with the foundation of the American colonies, the presence of so large a body of their countrymen in the United States, and the experiences of the patriots of Bohemia in Europe—experiences so similar to those of the founders of this republic—render the history of Bohemia's career essential to the education of every American. To one who has the pleasure and honor to know the educated, progressive Bohemian American, and who is somewhat familiar with the tragic events which make up the history of his fatherland, the mere name of Bohemia is a word to thrill and inspire. It is a difficult task to be judicial in the presence of the heroes and martyrs of such a country, as they are made to live again by the pen of the sympathetic historian. But, fortunately, enthusiasm and truth do not conflict, in this instance, and so the reader can abandon himself with no misgivings to the sad pleasure which the perusal of Mr. Vickers's book is sure to give him.

The civil constitution of Bohemia is the parent of that of England and our own. It is well for us to study the history of centuries' struggle "to maintain and transmit an institutional system, almost identical with that of the United States, during those dark ages when almost all semblance of a recognition of popular institutions had elsewhere disappeared. To the many struggles of Bohemia we owe the perpetuation of our boasted freedom in an era when only the Bohemian arm was raised in its defense." Seven centuries before the Mayflower landed this struggle was in progress, and though during the six succeeding centuries the spirit that waged it sometimes nearly died out, it was never subdued, though often beaten, and almost crushed into obliteration for two hundred and seventy years. The struggle for a free mind, for a free body, for popular self-government, and national independence—in a word, for liberty—was persistent and blood flowed in rivers. "Bohemia's early enlightenment and free civil policy in one sense proved its misfortune, inasmuch as the rest of the world was then too barbarous and too cruel either to understand or to tolerate it." To understand the extreme difficulty attendant upon the effort to gather the materials for an accurate history of this devoted country, the reader must understand that the enemies of Bohemia have ever striven to destroy its literature. "Only by remnants discovered at intervals outside its borders, from Italy to Sweden, and from Silesia to Scotland, have chroniclers and scholars been able to secure the materials sufficient for a history." "Again and again has the work of centuries been effaced by the fury of the devastator, and as late as 1849 there were those who traversed the land destroying Bohemia's books with as much vindictiveness as of old."

Five principal periods constitute the story of Bohemia:

I. From the foundation of the nation to the death of Otakar, 1278.

II. From 1278 to the close of the Hussite wars, 1435.

III. From the Hussite wars to the Reformation period and the calamities of 1545.

IV. From 1545 to the dreadful disasters and cruel sufferings, 1620-1635.

V. From that period to the revival of Bohemian language and life, 1848-1870.

In Chapter X Mr. Vickers tells of the conflict that was precipitated in Bohemia by the determination of Rome to root the married clergy out and substitute therefor the celibate priesthood. In this connection, he says: "In imitation of the more logical Oriental religious mendicants and fakirs, with whom dirt was equivalent to holiness, who smeared ashes and other viler things on their faces, and defiled themselves with all uncleanness in demonstration of their subjugation of the senses, the Christian ascetics perverted the very institution of their own existence by endeavors to root out the faculties and instincts that render man capable of virtue and love, and fill him with the warm feelings of kindly zeal in tender sympathy with social and domestic loves and duties. The body came to be regarded, most illogically and stupidly, as an enemy to be crushed by every severity, and when it became like charcoal as to all feelings, when it was no longer a body but a shape with every human attribute burned out of it, it was supposed to have attained perfection. . . . Rome adopted the principle of converting the clergy of every country into an ecclesiastical police as far removed as possible from the laity in social sympathies. Everywhere the married priests were denounced. Synods decreed and pulpits thundered. In Spain, France, Italy, England, Germany the ban of the church was hurled against married priests and their families. Preferments were denied to the sons of the clergy." At a council held in Rome in 1051 the wives of priests, "who saw their own sons priests, found themselves suddenly made helots and criminals, cast out from all society, degraded, and scorned, and declared Slaves to the Cathedral church of Lateran; while all the bishops in Europe were directed to apply the same awful scourge within their jurisdiction, and make the wives of the clergy slaves to the churches in every diocese."

Of course it is well known that Rome had ample Bible authority for its preference for the celibate priesthood. Paul devotes an entire chapter to a laudation of the virgin devotee and says that marriage is to be contracted only as the lesser of two evils.

During the continuance of this war against the married clergy "the whole of Europe was deafened by a shriek for another crusade" against the Saracens. The tornado of excitement swept over Bohemia as well as the rest of Western Europe. Thousands rallied to the standards of Louis VII. and Conrad. The crusade was a failure and the few who returned had learned "that the mundane blessings of order, foresight, discipline, and a commissariat, as well as the philosophy of worldly wisdom necessary for the command of an army, cannot be supplied by empty fanaticism and ignorance, however fervid in devotions. The cry, 'The army of the Lord,' creates neither bread nor strategy. Rarely had an overthrow been more dreadful. The Bohemians returned in deep disgust at the blind infatuation that set conceited fanaticism where precise military arrangements ought to have been."

Referring to the wholesale expulsion of various dissenting elements of the population of Bohemia and Moravia, Mr. Vickers observes that it is thus that bigotry and tyranny robbed the nations of their best characters, denuding their populations of hereditary gifts and graces, and sterilizing the coming ages. "The effect of such proscriptions has appeared in the predominance of inferior qualities in several central European countries, and accounts for much of the degradation and viciousness of character that still defiles European provinces and is the curse of American cities and industrial centers. It is difficult to feel sympathy for populations that have wilfully wasted themselves by the destruction of their own most inquiring and enterprising members." If one would have a realizing sense of what the church has done for the impoverishment and poisoning of the blood of the race let him carefully study the history of one small country of Europe and he will see in miniature a picture of the devastation wrought in them all by the same malignant power.

The "History of Bohemia" should be read by everyone who may think that religion vested with political power is not a curse to all who come under its sway. If there are those who favor the cessation of active antagonism to the encroachments of the Sabbatarians and other theocrats and champions of injected righteousness, on the ground that the liberties of a free people cannot be overthrown in this day of intelligence, let those persons follow carefully the narrative of Mr. Vickers, and there learn how many and insidious are the devices of ecclesiastics for the extinguishment of enlightenment and the consequent destruction of all that a free people hold dear.

The work is illustrated by a map and a number of pictures, including portraits of John Hus, Cosmas, Dean of Prague, John Zizka, John Amos Komensky, Charles Harrlicek, Francis Palacky, and other distinguished sons of Bohemia. The binding is good, the paper and letter-press are excellent and the illustrations well designed and executed. The volume is certainly a desirable addition to our libraries of history, and we hope that the publishers will succeed in putting it into the hands of a great many Americans who are such by birth, as well as those who are citizens by adoption.

In the Bohemian Voice of Omaha of November 1, we find a portrait and biographical sketch of the author of the "History of Bohemia." From it we learn that Mr. R. H. Vickers is a native of Dublin and a graduate of the famous Trinity College in that city. In 1891 he published his great work, "The Martyrdoms of Literature." He is a member of the Chicago bar. By the way, the Chicago bar is contributing considerable very valuable literature to the world. It was a member of that guild, Mr. Bronson C. Keeler, who gave us that splendid little book, "A Short History of the Bible," and another member, Judge Charles B. Waite, who wrote the much-prized work, "The History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred."

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895 is the best issued. Its articles are in a high degree entertaining and instructive. Colonel Ingersoll gives us "The Old and the New." The clergy are fond of telling us what the church has done for woman. Matilda Joselyn Gage tells us "What the Church Has Not Done for Woman." "What are Women Here For?" asks Helen H. Gardener. We know what one woman, Helen H. Gardener, is here for. She is here to write good, reformatory books and essays, and the article contributed to the ANNUAL is bright and interesting. Mr. Putnam reviews the work of the Freethought Federation of America; James B. Alexander recounts the "Progress of Science;" A. H. Hamilton contributes an article on "Freethought in the Church and in the Higher Literature;" Henry Rowley, the gallant captain of the Brooklyn Freethinkers, tells "What We Stand For," while the Editor gives an interesting historical sketch of "Freethought in the United States" for the last three or four years. Susan H. Wixon and Katie Kehm Smith give valuable advice regarding the instruction of children. John Peck's friends will all desire to read his account of "A Queer God and his Queer Book." George MacDonald supplies the poetry, and gives us a story about "The One-Horned Ox," in his own inimitable style. Neglect to send for the ANNUAL, and you will miss one of the best things of the season. J. E. REMSBURG.

Gems of Thought.

WHAT has ecclesiasticism to do with moral laws? It puts them all aside and puts its own creed and catechism in their place.—J. A. Froude.

MEN partially adapted to the social state retrograde on being placed in circumstances which call forth the old propensities.—Herbert Spencer.

FAITH in the solidarity and fraternity of the nations is becoming universal. Neither milliards of rubles, nor millions of soldiers, nor wars, nor revolutions, can accomplish what one free man can do.—Tolstoi.

WE are all tattooed in our cradles with the beliefs of our tribe; the record may seem superficial, but it is indelible. You can not educate a man wholly out of the superstitious fears which were early implanted in his imagination, no matter how utterly his reason may reject them.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

THE story of freedom proceeds. Each day gives its chapter. The interest never lessens. There seem defeats, victories; there seem negativ results, that mean neither success nor failure; there seem interruptions to the plot, episodes, digressions, that turn laugh upon philosophers and chagrin upon priests. But the placid tenor of event, every item of phenomena at peace with its neighbor, opens its book daily to a fresh-written page.—Horace L. Traubel.

THERE cannot be the slightest doubt in the world that the argument which applies to the improvement of the horse from an earlier stock, or of ape from ape, applies to the improvement of man from some simpler and lower stock than man. There is not a single faculty—functional or structural, moral, intellectual, or instinctive—there is no faculty whatever that is not capable of improvement; there is no faculty whatever which does not depend upon structure, and, as structure tends to vary, it is capable of being improved.—T. H. Huxley.

THE fact that climatic and other material necessities, partly originating from national habits, partly from the demands of labor, cause the modern world to cover itself at nearly all times with garments has no relation to this question [nude in art] and does not account for the attitude of those who find nude art objectionable. It is notable that this feeling toward the body, proclaimed from the desert cells of Lybra, the ruins of Syria, from the catacombs of Rome, and emphasized by the fierce cutthroat secretaries of Greece, Alexandria, and Asia Minor, was followed by a thousand years of moral as well as intellectual degradation. Not as a consequence, but coincidentally. The modern objection to the nude in art is not openly and distinctly on religious grounds, but on the score of morality, an approach by indirection.—Roger Cunningham, in American Art Printer.

POLITICS rest on necessary foundations, and cannot be treated with levity. Republics abound in young civilians, who believe that the laws make the city, that grave modifications of the policy and modes of living, and employments of the population, that commerce, education, and religion, may be voted in or out; and that any measure, though it were absurd, may be imposed on a people, if only you get sufficient voices to make it a law. But the wise know that foolish legislation is a rope of sand which perishes in the twisting; that the state must follow, and not lead the character and progress of the citizen; the strongest usurper is quickly got rid of, and they only who build on Ideas build for eternity; and that the form of government which prevails is the expression of what cultivation exists in the population which permits it. The law is only a memorandum.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

THINK of the fanaticism, of the endless persecutions! First of all think of the religious wars, this atrocious madness, of which the ancients had no conception; then of the Crusades, which were an utterly unjustifiable massacre with the war-cry, "God wills it," in order to gain possession of the grave of him who preached love and tolerance. Think of the cruel expulsion and extermination of the Moors and Jews from Spain. Think of the massacres, the slaughters, and inquisitions; think of the great and blood-shedding conquests of the Mohammedans in three continents; think of the Christians in America, where they exterminated the natives to a great extent—in Cuba, where they exterminated them altogether, and where, according to Las Casas, they murdered within forty years twelve million men—all, of course, ad majorem Dei gloriam, and for the sake of spreading the gospel, and also because all those who were not Christians were not regarded as human beings.—Schopenhauer.

At a recent wedding in Ohio, the minister was about to salute the bride, when she stopped him with, "No, mister, I give up them vanities now."

"Do you like Zoroaster, Mr. Cahokia?" she asked. "Why, Miss Ticklowell," answered the young man somewhat vaguely, "I don't object to it, you know, but I always preferred the yellor kind."

OVER the portal of a magnificent villa near Dresden, Saxony, is written: "Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy-laden, and I will give you rest." But at the back entrance to the garden is a sign that reads: "No beggars admitted. The dog bites."

FATHER O'ROURKE: "Michael, my son, I hope you vote as I do." Mike Finnigan: "An' how does your rivrine vote?" Father O'Rourke: "Oh, I vote as I pray." Mike Finnigan: "Ooh, it's for money, thin. Yis, your reverence, Oi am wid yez."—Life.

FLOSSY is a little girl whose ideas of creation are yet crude, but she is very curious. "Is all of us made out of dust, mamma?" she asked the other day. "Yes, Flossie." "Little babies, too?" "Yes." The child was silent for a moment. "Mamma," she said, "Heaven must be a drefful dusty place."

SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENT: "I am glad to see quite a number of new faces with us to-day—bright, eager faces, full of interest in the Sunday school, and rejoicing to be here. And now, before we close this little talk about the lesson and listen to the report of the secretary, I will wait a moment to see if there are any points that have been overlooked. Has anyone a question to ask?" Several of the New Boys: "Goin' to hav a Chris'mus tree this year?"—Chicago Tribune.

It was only the other Sunday some tourists from Manchester were tramping about the highlands in search of the beautiful, when, becoming thirsty, they made their way to a farm, and asked the old lady to sell them some milk. But Mrs. McGregor, deeply religious, felt shocked, and exclaimed: "Whit did ye say? Sell milk on the Sabboth day? Na, na! I couldna dae that; but ye talk so decent I'll just gae ye thirpence worth for naething, an' ye can jist make me a present o' a shullin'."—Sporting Chronicle.

DANCIN' DAVID.

There was a lad was born lang syne;
The first of ancient kingly line—
A saintly loon to God's ain min—
The name he bore was David.

David was a daffin' lad,
Dancin', daffin'; dancin', daffin';
David was a daffin' lad,
Dancin', daffin' David.

His first exploit whan but a loon,
And ere he wore the regal gown,
Was when he cracked Goliath's croon,
An' proved the worth o' David.

An' syne as king o' Jewish race,
He focted so hard to keep his place,
That bluid was spilt without surcease,
In aid o' saintly David.

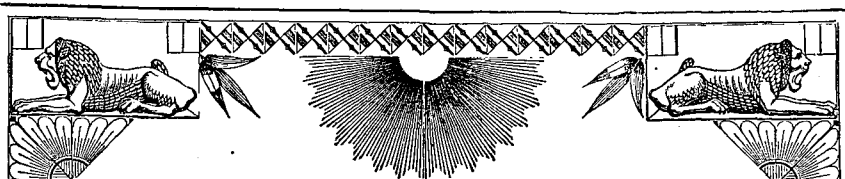

Afore the ark he jigged sae weel,
An' hoched and blew in holy reel,
That his guid wife turned on her heel
An' ftyed† saintly David.

But a'e guid wife was far ower-few
Whan fair Bathsheba cam' in view;
But that bit daffin' made him rue,
An' wrocht foul shame on David.

This auld-time saint gaed † thro' the mill,
An' whan o' life he had his fill
He deed† as kings and commons will,
An' God was proud o' David.

SIGNS OF TROUBLE.

And he showed me Joshua the high priest standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right hand to assist him.—Zech. iii, 1.

To the Senate and Assembly of the Legislature of the State of New York:

We citizens of the State of New York, respectfully request you to repeal the Sunday law of this State. We ask this because,

First, Sunday being a period of time of precisely the same nature as Saturday or Monday, there is no natural reason for its being elevated above or depressed below the other days of the week.

Second, Said Sunday law is, in the best possible view of it, useless; it is wholly inoperative as a conservator of the rights of any inhabitant of the State.

Third, It is invasive of the equal rights of the citizens of the State, an impertinent meddling with their private affairs, and its effect is to disturb their peace and rob them of their earnings.

Fourth, In making or amending our laws, common sense and experience should be the guides, instead of sentiment—religious or otherwise. Experience has demonstrated that Sunday laws are not observed by the people, and common sense teaches that, in the nature of things, they never will be, for it cannot be wrong to do on one day what it is right to do on another. The people, feeling this and knowing this, will not be governed by the dead churchmen who made these laws, which are anachronistic and have been perpetuated by hypocrisy. Here we will call your attention to the words of Martin Luther, a churchman we are willing to put against the ecclesiastics of to-day: "As regards the Sabbath, or Sunday, there is no necessity of keeping it. . . . If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake—if anywhere anyone sets up its observance upon a Jewish foundation—then I order you to work on it, to dance on it, to ride on it, to feast on it—to do anything that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit of liberty."

Fifth, Sunday laws are vicious, for they are used as instruments of blackmail and of cruel oppression by the police of the cities, as the revelations of the Lexow Committee abundantly show. They produce more crime than they could possibly prevent, for blackmail is more immoral than drinking.

Sixth, All such laws are essentially religious in their intent and effect and as such they are opposed to the spirit of our institutions, which do not favor the union of church and state. The Sunday law of the State of New York is no exception to the rule, and it should be immediately repealed in the interest of religious liberty, if for no other reason. This law is a survival from the time when there was a state church and the civil power enforced the Sunday law of the state church, just as it enforced that church's blasphemy and heresy statutes. But where there is no state church the state has nothing to do with the enforcement of the domestic rules of any church or those of Christianity in its entirety.

For these and other reasons we ask the entire repeal of the Sunday laws rather than a patching which shall discriminate against one business and foster another. We ask that the liquor trade be subject to the same rules on Sunday that it is on other days, and the same with all other kinds of business. It is not proper for the state to legislate in the interests of any legitimate trade as against any other legitimate trade, and we ask your careful attention to this admitted fact and particularly ask you to bear in mind the also admitted fact that Sunday laws are a fruitful source and an adequate means of blackmail.

ances now indicate, although serious and continued opposition at Vienna might transform the liberal into a radical movement.

IN their testimony before the Lexow Committee Police Commissioner Martin and Superintendent Byrnes said that it was impossible to keep the force up to a high standard, owing to the political influences brought to bear to secure positions for "workers." Byrnes reflected severely on the commissioners.

THE legislature of Georgia takes the "high moral ground" that woman should not earn her own living in occupations which will permit her to handle her wages, and so it has defeated a resolution authorizing the governor to carry out his desire to appoint a woman to the office of assistant librarian.

IT is reported that a hospital at San Gabriel, in which were 120 rebel wounded, was burned by Brazilian troops, the victims who tried to escape being driven back into the flames. It is about an even thing whether the story is true or false, as dispatches from that part of the world are not the most reliable.

CHARLES W. MOWBRAY, the English Revolutionary Communist, was arrested in Philadelphia on December 28th on the charge of having said in a speech that the flag was fit only to wipe one's nose on and that the police should be wiped off the face of the earth. He was sent to jail to await trial in default of bail for $1,200.

TRYING TO DAM (DAMN) THE FREETHOUGHT TORRENT.

400 Years of Freethought.

From Columbus to Ingersoll ————— By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons have subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might have been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type have reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits have proved the most expensive—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractive—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will give the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called “half-tone” pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 19 (next week) JOHN P. WHIPPLE will explain the CAUSE OF THE GULF STREAM AND ALL SIMILAR OCEAN CURRENTS.

The Campaign in This State.

We hope our readers will give us what moral and financial aid they can in circulating the petition to the legislature for the repeal of the Sunday laws in this state. It is particularly the fight of the citizens of New York, but as every struggle of this kind anywhere in the country helps in all states, aid from outsiders interested in the attempt to realize the Nine Demands will not be refused.

The time is particularly opportune this winter, as there is to be a general discussion of the Sunday issue at Albany. The liquor dealers of the state seem to have been promised by both parties—and very strongly by the party which won in the late election—that their interests shall be considered, and legislation in their interests enacted. This is generally understood to mean opening the saloons for a portion of each Sunday. Of course such legislation will be strenuously resisted by the ecclesiastics, who see in this another chance for the people to slip away from them. The matter will be argued pro and con, and the church will show her hand, and the clergy are sure to expose the real animus of their protests against the proposed law, which is to save to themselves the day on which they earn their living.

This will give the Freethinkers their opportunity, and they will miss it sadly if they do not jump in and see that the legislators have the true doctrine on the Sunday question presented to them.

We propose to send the petitions out all through the state, together with printed arguments against any Sunday legislation; to get the petitions signed numerously and presented to every member of the Senate and Assembly; and when the Sunday legislation is referred to the proper committee for consideration and recommendation thereon, it is our intention to have some good men represent the Freethinkers and make some speeches to that committee.

This will cost money—a good deal of it. We ought to have five hundred dollars at least. The clerical forces will spend thousands of dollars. The Freethinkers cannot do that, but we believe they can raise enough to do what we have so briefly outlined. THE TRUTH SEEKER is bound to do something to start the thing going, and how vigorous we can make the fight will depend upon how much we are aided. A ten dollar bill will do a great deal, and we would like to have every New Yorker who can afford it send us one of them to push this along. If you cannot send ten, send five, or four, or whatever you can spare for this work.

Let us hear from you at once, friends, so we can know what to depend upon. The more you send the hotter will we make the fight.

The "Sabbath" Campaign.

Following the "Sabbath" convention at Williamsport, came that at Greensburg, Pa., on Dec. 12 and 13. The Covenanter papers report that it was a "decided success." We are informed that "Greensburg and vicinity was thoroughly aroused to a sense of the peril in which the Sabbath law is placed and of the importance of earnest, united work for its maintenance." Still more significant is this statement:

"All the speakers laid the chief stress, not on the humanitarian side of the Sabbath law, but on the fact that it is of divine appointment."

We are pleased to see that the Sabbatarians have lately been inclined to make comparatively little of the pretension that they are working primarily for the betterment of the material condition of the "laborer." It is more than probable that our demonstration of the fact that all classes can get the rest they need without the intervention of special laws for Sunday has convinced the day-worshippers that it will be best for them to stick to their religious argument for Sunday legislation, and not attempt to handle secular firebrands with bare hands. But to return to the Greensburg convention proceedings: Rev. W. W. Moorehead deplored the fact that "after all that the Sabbath had done for Pennsylvania and the nation" it should be necessary to meet together to defend it. He conveniently forgets that the convention was called to defend Sunday laws, not the religious institution of a Sabbath. If the rite of baptism had heretofore been compulsory in Pennsylvania, attempts to modify or repeal the law enforcing it would not be an attack on the rite itself, but on the state-enforced observance of a religious ceremony. The distinction is clear, and it is vital. Mr. Moorehead also remarked that "especially since the Sabbath is a divine institution, it is both strange and humiliating that there should be found in our land those who oppose it." Here again we have the same attempt to obscure the issue. No one objects to the observance of the day as a divine institution by those who think it is such. Their tyrannous endeavors to compel those to reverence it who do not believe in the institution, is what has caused all the trouble. These Christian gentlemen of the Sabbath associations claim that they are unalterably opposed to the union of church and state, and yet they declare that it is strange and humiliating that there are those who are not willing that the state should compel obedience to what they call a divine institution. Is it possible that they are so bigotry-blinded that they cannot see that when the civil power undertakes the enforcement of religious law, church and state are united in the most direct and effective way? Mr. Moorehead declares that Sunday is a divine institution, and he demands that the state enforce its observance as such, and yet in the face of this claim, coupled in the relation of cause to this demand as effect, he and his confrères assert persistently and vociferously that they stand for religious liberty, for the total and perpetual separation of state and church. Could self-stultification further go?

Dr. Moorehead expressed the hope that the new governor of Pennsylvania will be "like his predecessor, who bravely stood between the legislature and the Sabbath law." This time it is the Sabbath law that is in jeopardy, instead of the divine institution of the Sabbath. Did the reverend gentleman forget the part he was apparently playing? Or does he, like some of his brethren, think that the divine institution of the Sabbath will go down in ruin without the sustaining arm of human law, and that it will carry Christianity with it in its fall? To recur to the comments on ex-Governor Pattison and Governor Hastings: "The two governors differ a little in politics, but they are both Methodists, and if we can't rely on their politics perhaps we can on their religion." It is a very pertinent question that this suggests—Should there be any laws on the statute books of such a character that the religious opinions of the chief officer of the state would in any way affect their retention or enforcement? The reply cannot be categorical; certainly there should be no such statutes as the present Sunday laws, but it is easily conceivable that a narrow religionist might be elected who would not wish to see a law for the equal taxation of all kinds of property, including that owned by the churches, strictly enforced.

Rev. J. A. Marquiss assailed the Seventh-Day Adventists, calling attention to the great amount of literature they distributed, and insinuating that, as they are so few in number, it is doubtful if they are able to bear the financial burdens of this work, and as they are in "close alliance with Infidels" a suspicion is raised. This is rich indeed! Mr. Marquiss attempted to break the force of our contention that the state has no more right to enforce the observance of Sunday than it has the various rites and ceremonies of baptism, the Lord's supper, circumcision, the passover and the like. He said that it differed in character from those rites, and to prove it he appealed to the Bible. But he should know that in this republic, where the organic law forbids the union of religion and the state, no political question can be authoritatively settled by the Bible.

Rev. W. A. Edie thought that "wages for work on the Sabbath are ill-gotten and a curse rests upon them." How little hold this superstitious delusion has on his mind is shown by the fact that he works in the pulpit every Sunday for wages. Rev. A. L. Yount, pastor of the Lutheran church of Greensburg, endeavored to prove that Luther was in favor of Sunday laws. He said that Luther made a distinction between "the law as a moral precept and the law with its ceremonial accompaniments." Luther, according to Mr. Yount, "maintained that Christians should rise above and be free from that slavish feeling which keeps the law merely as a legal enactment; . . . but if men will not rise to this sphere, if they persist in disregarding the Sabbath law, they should be restrained from its public desecration by the civil power." But this does not explain away Luther's explicit declaration that "there is no necessity for its [Sunday's] observance," especially as he immediately adds that if we do observe the day it should be, "not because Moses commanded it," but because nature indicates that we should rest at certain times. This shows that Luther did not regard the law of the Sabbath as of divine origin, further than that God speaks through nature. But the modern Sabbatarian is not content with this, for he maintains that God directly ordered the observance, through all time, of a Sabbath, and that his orders are registered in the Bible. Inasmuch as Luther says that there is no necessity for the observance of the Sabbath nor of Sunday, as quoted by Michelet, it is perfectly clear that he repudiated the claims of both the first and the seventh days of the week; and if he could thus hold that there is no moral obligation resting on the Christian to voluntarily observe either day, how could he logically and fairly contend that the non-believer should be made to do outward reverence to the day, or to one of the two days, as Mr. Yount says he did? Will the reverend gentleman produce his proofs, if he has any?

Paul S. Gaither, a lawyer, maintained that the laws of a people are always founded on their religion, and insisted upon the religious element in our Sunday legislation. It is to be hoped that Mr. Gaither will never occupy a place on the bench. Evidently he is not aware that the founders of this republic discarded the notion that religion and politics could be safely joined, and that they framed the Constitution on the broad basis of religious freedom, realizing that there never could be justice for the minority if the majority were permitted to vote dogma into law. The theocrat holds that the state can—and must—officially recognize and foster religion. The Freethinker maintains that the state has no positive relation to religion, that all it can rightfully do is to protect all citizens equally in their right to worship or not to worship. This is the line of cleavage, sharp and unmistakable, and when Sabbatarian speakers and writers argue for "the religious element in legislation," they are pleading for the subversion of the civil republic and the establishment of a theological despotism on its ruins. This is the self-confessed design of the Sabbatarians.

Following the Greensburg meeting came a National Reform Convention at New Castle, December 18 to 20, inclusive. The Christian Reformer reports that it was a "fine meeting," nearly two hundred delegates being enrolled at the opening session, and the addresses showing a "clear view of the situation, and the necessity of the faithful application of Bible principles to the political and social problems of our times." On December 25 and 26 a similar convention was held at Morning Sun, Iowa. It is the intention of the reactionists to hold many more such conventions in Pennsylvania and other states during the winter. The crusade for the Christianization of the Constitution and statutes is being pushed with fanatic zeal and directed with splendid strategic talent, and it will succeed if not antagonized with equal zeal and as consummate generalship—nay, it is succeeding, as the next paragraphs will show.

Vermont has had a Sunday law which recognized the "Sabbath" as ending at sunset, but this did not satisfy the day-worshippers, and so they prevailed on the last legislature, of odorous memory, to extend the legal Sunday to midnight. We learn from the Brattleboro Phenix that four weeks ago the "Law and Order League" of that city commanded all barber shops, news stands, fruit stores, and meat markets to close at twelve o'clock Saturday night and not open until the same hour Sunday night. Three weeks later the livery stable keepers were notified that they must let no horses Sunday, unless for funerals or in case of urgent necessity. With one exception the stables were all closed the next Sunday. The fruit stores, news stands, markets, restaurants, and other places usually, in most cities, open on Sunday were ordered not to open at sundown. Some of them did, and the proprietors, with the one recusant livery man, were arrested. Those who indulge in any recreation or play any game in the twenty-four hours that are taboo are liable to be fined, the same as are those who labor.

The Phenix says it was expected that the sale of all Sunday papers will be forbidden hereafter; on Sunday, December 23, the Boston papers arrived and were sold as usual. It is also probable that the delivery of milk and the pleasure riding of those who own the rigs they use will be prevented if possible. Among the other places ordered closed was the office of the electric light company, in which is the public telephone station. Just think of the anachronism of Sunday laws surviving and actually being made more rigorous in an age of electric light and telephones and telegraphs! Why, if the Sabbatarian spirit could have always dominated the world there would not be an electric light plant or a railroad on the surface of the earth.

At Williamsburg, New York, eight men were recently found guilty of working on Sunday and were sent to jail. The law that permits the commission of such a monstrous crime is infamous and is possible of enforcement only because justices and judges think more of their paltry salaries than they do of equity and human rights. We need a thousand Gaynors on the bench—men who know that the office of judge is prostituted when injustice is done in the name of law. The justice who will send a man to jail for working on the priest's day to get bread for his children, when he can avoid the infamy by resigning his little trumpery office, is as much less than a man as are the legislators who put the miserable law on the statute books.

Repeal the Sunday laws. They are impertinent, they are oppressive, they are criminal. Down with the Sunday laws.

Ministers on Church Exemption.

The question of church taxation is to the front in Milwaukee. Everybody is discussing it; even the ministers have been forced to appear in print in defense or condemnation of the exemption of the enormous wealth of the ecclesiastical bodies. A copy of the Sentinel of December 24 is before us as we write, and in it we find more than four columns of letters from ministers of the city, printed in fine type, and this installment is but the continuation of a discussion that appears to have been in progress for some time. H. F. Fairbanks, pastor of St. Patrick's church, declares that taxation of churches is "wholly non-American," which is one of the most peculiar "non-American" or "un-American" things of which we have ever heard, and this is saying a good deal, for there is scarcely any law, custom, or belief to which some one has not applied this very handy epithet. Sigmund Hecht, rabbi of Emanu-El temple, says that if churches are taxed you "overburden those least able to bear the load, thereby violating the fundamental principle of taxation." It has always seemed to us that the fundamental principle of taxation is—or should be—that those should pay the taxes who own the property. We are very sorry that Rabbi Hecht does not agree with us, but we are pleased to find immediately below his, a letter from Rabbi V. Caro, of B'ne Jeshurun church, from which we can cull this gem: "As a check upon ecclesiasticism, I am for the taxation of all church property. The state has no right to tax one man for the purpose of propagating another man's religion."

James Slidell, pastor of St. John's Episcopal church, remarks that one of the principal reasons why he is opposed to church taxation is the fact that legislators, as a rule, are "men who are not religious, and so incapable of viewing the subject in the abstract." So, presumably, we are to continue to permit the churches to abstract their taxes from the pockets of non-church members. The same gentleman affirms that "it seems almost an insult to Almighty God to even talk about taxing churches." By the way, did not one Jesus, reputed to be the only son of God, say that it was the duty of his followers to render unto Caesar—the state—what was due thereto? At least, the Bible makes that statement. Rev. E. D. Huntly places himself on record as heartily in favor of the taxation of all church property except hospitals. James Churm, pastor of the Sherman Street Methodist church, is willing to have all church property taxed. Charles Hedler, pastor of the German M. E. church, would not object to the taxation of churches and other church property used for other purposes than worship, but thinks that the taxation of the houses dedicated to the "worship of God" would be sacrilege. He would also exempt parochial schools. I. L. Cory, pastor of the Pilgrim Congregational church, wants the state to at once cease all appropriations to churches and schools, but is unalterably opposed to the taxation of church property. Is it possible that he does not see that exemption of churches from taxation is itself an appropriation from the state? He says that if the state taxes a church which was built and is sustained by fifty families, those fifty families will have "to go a little deeper into their pockets and help carry the burdens of the state." Well, they should; the only possible alternative is that other families who do not want the church must put their hands in their pockets a little deeper to pay these fifty church families' taxes, to help bear the state's burden for them. Has Mr. Cory never looked at this side of the question? August Pieper, pastor of St. Marcus Lutheran church, declares that the state is amply repaid for the protection it accords to the church, and therefore should not tax its property; but Theodore Jaekel, pastor of Lutheran Grace church, says that "it is only in accordance with the fundamental principles of justice and right that all property should be taxed according to its valuation," and George Kuechle, of the Immanuel Lutheran church, agrees with Mr. Jaekel.

W. K. Frick, of the Church of the Redeemer, is in favor of exemption on the "moral influence" pretext. William J. Corr, of the Epworth M. E. church, would exempt property used for religious and educational purposes, but tax that from which a revenue is derived. T. B. Snow, elder of the Seventh-Day Adventists, would, of course, tax all kinds of property, holding that all that the church can equitably ask of the state is freedom of worship. Herman Burns, pastor of the Fifth Baptist church, has for years advocated the taxation of all church property. He says: "The ablest and most unselfish of our statesmen for the last twenty-five years have all seen the necessity and advocated this reform." G. L. Limper, pastor of the Immanuel German M. E. church, is against taxation. He thinks that the people are educated and moralized by the spectacle of wealthy corporations demanding the protection of the state and refusing to pay for it, as ordinary men and associations do. Frederick Huelster, of the Bethel church, says: "I am of the conviction that all church property should be taxed to do justice to the citizen who does not belong to any church organization, and to lessen the burden of taxation in general." C. S. Haack, pastor of the German Evangelical Friedens Congregation, writes that years ago he presented to his people a resolution in favor of the taxation of all church property, and they said "yes" to it.

The leaven of justice is working, even in the most orthodox churches, and we may well feel encouraged. On with the educational campaign.

Great Reductions in Standard Freethought Works.

The popularity of our missionary scheme, by which Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is being scattered broadcast by the thousands, has induced us to lower the price of his other works, with the hope that they too will have a wider reading. From this date the prices of Paine's books will be as follows:

AGE OF REASON. Paper, 25 cents. Eight copies sent to as many different addresses for $1. Cloth, 50 cents.

EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Paper, 15 cents.

COMMON SENSE. The argument that did more than any other to convince the Revolutionary leaders of the necessity of the separation of this country from Great Britain. Paper, 15 cents.

THE CRISIS. Paine's great Revolutionary writings. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Answer to Burke's attack on the French Revolution. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PAINE'S GREAT WORKS IN ONE VOLUME. 8vo., 800 pp., cloth, $3, leather $4, morocco, gilt edges, $4 50. This book and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $5.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. One volume containing Age of Reason, Examination of the Prophecies, Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff, Essay on Dreams, Letters, etc. With Life of Paine and steel portrait. Cloth, $1.

We hope all our readers will do their best to scatter these splendid works all over the country.

Paine and Franklin.

We shall print in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 26, 1895, an article by W. H. BURR on

"THE SECRET THRIFT OF THOMAS PAINE."

This Mr. Burr regards as a very important contribution to the literature on Paine, as being something new for the biographers to consider on the approaching Paine Anniversary.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 2 we shall have a long article by JOHN E. REMSBURG on "BENJAMIN FRANKLIN: WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?"

Everyone who has read Mr. Remsburg's works knows the thoroughness with which he will deal with this subject, and also knows that when he has read this paper he will know more about Franklin than the average man does at present.

Single copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 7 cents. In quantities of five and over, 5 cents each. Now is the time to subscribe.

The Boston board of aldermen, by a vote of 7 to 4, finally decided to continue the licenses of the Sunday concert houses. So one more Sabbatic crusade has failed. We judge that the literature sent from this office to the aldermen helped them to reach their common sense conclusion.

Lemuel K. Washburn, editor of the Boston Investigator from the death of Horace Seaver until a few months ago, is now in the Infidel lecture field. He is anxious to be kept constantly employed in that department of the work, and those who secure his services will find him to be an excellent speaker. His residence is, Revere, Massachusetts. Ask him for dates.

Rabbi Wise, of Cincinnati, will have to discipline Rabbi Danziger of San Jose, who says through the Mercury of that city that he "would a thousand times rather listen to Colonel Ingersoll than to Moody, Sam Jones, Sankey, and the rest, whose preaching has driven more people into insane asylums than into the fold of free, reasonable, rational, and tolerant citizenship."

They have one minister in Brooklyn—Dr. A. P. McDiarmid, Baptist—who sees clearly where the exemption of church property from taxation logically leads. In his pamphlet, "Should Church Property be Taxed?" he says: "Accepting the support of the state, we must logically accept the authority of the state over the church. It is practically the argument by which the state-church has always been defended."

Kaiser William has recently had another attack of the divine assumptions. He said to the Guard's recruits:

"Do not forget that your coat is that of your king. Do not forget that. Think of your oath. My commands, no matter whether they call upon you to defend the fatherland or to maintain order or religion, you have to obey to the death."

To defend religion? Is there danger of an armed attack being made on religion in Germany? If so, by whom? The Higher Critics? The Freethinkers? The Jews? Or is his Majesty contemplating a crusade of extermination against some one or all of these or against the Mohammedans? Or is he merely talking to amuse himself or frighten his children?"

The New York Herald has investigated the charge of one Louis S. Streep, an alleged green goods man, that he paid Anthony Comstock $1000 to have an indictment against him withdrawn. The further testimony secured by the Herald is of the same purport as that brought out before the Lexow committee and published in THE TRUTH SEEKER last week.

Trinity Church Corporation has been quite severely handled by the press of this city for its neglect of its tenements. Even so conservative a paper as the Times does not hesitate to say that "the riches and fashionableness of Trinity do not protect it against an exposure of the horrors of its ill-managed tenement system. They make it all the more vulnerable. They make it all the more the duty of a newspaper to call attention to the shortcomings of this favored corporation."

It is evident that Professor Huxley has reconsidered his formerly expressed opinion, made so much of by the Bible-in-the-schools people, that the state should teach religion in the schools which it supports. We glean from the Freethinker that in "The Report upon State Education," drawn up by R. Laishly for the New Zealand government, he says: "Professor Huxley gives me leave to state his opinion to be 'that the principle of strict secularism in state education is sound, and must eventually prevail.'"

Our good friend, Dr. Jacob Hartman, author of "The Creation of God," gave away again this New Year's Day one thousand dinners to the poor. Three hundred of his tickets were sent to Joseph Barondess for the striking cloakmakers and they were all used. One thousand loaves, one thousand pints of milk, fourteen large cheeses, and five barrels of apples were consumed. Dr. Hartmann says that while he is not a millionaire he hopes to leave enough when he dies to establish a fund that will supply a thousand dinners every New Year's Day to those who call for them.

Mr. J. Spencer Ellis of Secular Thought sends to the Woodstock Times a capital examination of some of the wild claims of a Woodstock clergyman made in behalf of the Bible, and in the course of his arguments he makes a very neat and effective use of the "Wise case." But he is somewhat mistaken in regard to facts. Mr. Wise is not an editor; he has not had his trial, and, consequently, he is not now "serving a term in prison" for sending an excerpt from the Bible through the mails. His trial is set for April. He did lie in jail for a few weeks some months ago when first arrested, while he was waiting for bail and upon the dilatory action of the United States marshal.

Speaking of THE ANNUAL, we do not at this moment think of any better testimonial to its merits than the following note from our wide-awake South Carolina friend:

"MY DEAR MR. MACDONALD: I have just received ten copies of your ANNUAL for 1895, and as I look over the well-filled one hundred and odd pages, it occurs to me to say if any of your readers delays in ordering this good twenty-five cents' worth, he will regret it when he learns that the edition has been exhausted. To such I would say, Write at once for a copy, or two, if you have a good friend who is not likely to know of this edition, and you want to give him this pleasure. What more need be said? Send for THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895, and save disappointment. Sincerely, LOUIS LEVINE."

"The Unlicensed Preacher" in the Denver Field and Farm says:

"Religion is not a noise, nor a howl, nor singing in the church choir, nor demanding blessings of God, nor a reiteration of pardon from Christ. Religion is a work—a labor of love and charity and mercy among your fellowmen."

Religion is belief in and worship of supernatural powers. It has been manifested by noises, howls, danceings, singing in church choirs, demanding blessings of God, asking pardon through Christs of various names and times. Love, charity, and mercy are associated with religions, but were not born of religion and are not the special expression of any religion to-day. Before God was Humanity was, to paraphrase a sentiment of Kingdon Clifford's, and in humanity and its antetypes were germinated all the virtues as well as all the vices of humanity. Let us be done with the childish work of putting the strong wine of truth into the rotten bottles of religion. Don't try to crowd modern meanings into words that express nothing but ancient ideas. It is a waste of precious time and energy.

We wish our readers would look at the date on their wrappers and see if they do not owe us a renewal. If they find they do, it will be a great favor to us if they will forward it at their earliest convenience, as we need the money. Owing to various causes, more than the usual number are in arrears at present, and this embarrasses us financially, or we wouldn't mention it. We like to keep square with the world, and in order that we may do this it is necessary that our readers keep square with us, for when they let their subscriptions run behind we have to get behind with others. We have no capital to fall back upon, and depend upon getting our dues to give others their due. If our friends who are in arrears will note these facts and act thereupon, it will be, as we have said, a great favor to us, and a favor duly and thankfully appreciated.

It is not necessary to be a faith cure disciple or a Christian Scientist in order to perceive the unreasonable nature of the demand for the legal suppression of their doctors and the inhibition of their methods of treatment. Of course the patient should be given full freedom of choice in nominating his physician, but beyond this the law cannot go. It is urged that many die under the faith cure treatment, which is true, but what of it? Has it never occurred to those who clamor for repressive measures against the "irregulars" that people also die under orthodox medical treatment? In fact, do not the vast majority of those who pass away from other causes than old age have the assistance of physicians of the various schools during their illness? If we are to punish a faith cure doctor when he fails to save the sick person under his care, why should we not punish the regular physician who fails to save his patient? Let us be fair. It is much to be feared that Christian prejudice against those who try to apply the medical system of Jesus is at the bottom of this demand for the suppression of the people who eschew drugs and put their trust in prayer and faith. In this connection it might be profitable unto instruction to read the leading article in Foote's Health Monthly for December.

The fall and winter being more particularly the reading season, and naturally the renewing of subscription season, we hope that our friends will make a little effort to send THE TRUTH SEEKER some new subscribers. A good many of our old ones have had to drop off during the past eighteen months of panic and dullness in the business world, and we need some more to take their places and push on the work. Our friends have never failed us in an emergency, and we again venture to ask them to do something to help by inducing new subscriptions. We have tried to make this easy by the premium offers printed on the second page of this paper, and we think considerable can be done by our friends if they will take the trouble to speak a good word for us to their Liberal acquaintances.

To those who feel like presenting THE TRUTH SEEKER for a short time to some dear friend, our Trial Subscription offer opens the way at a small cost. A great many of the Liberals to whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is first sent this way become permanent subscribers and earnest workers in the cause of mental liberty.

And lastly, after you have induced some acquaintance to subscribe, and sent THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to some friend, send us the names of all the Liberals you know, and we will send them sample copies, and see if they, too, will not subscribe. We need them all.

Does Christianity Prevent Crime?

Of the many arguments used in defense of Christianity none is more strongly or frequently brought into action than the assertion that Christianity promotes morality. It is thundered from every pulpit and urged in all orthodox papers and tracts. Without Christianity we would have moral chaos; unless children go to Sunday-school, we are told, they will get into bad company, and without the Bible and the church virtue could not be maintained. Appalling descriptions of people who have not the influence of this blessed religion, or who have rejected it, are given to the world. Probably no Christian assertion has as much influence as this one. We find many Liberal-minded people who think that faith in Christianity should not be disturbed, because, as they allege, it would deprive the masses of moral restraint. That these ideas are false, and that Christianity does not prevent crime, our everyday experience will prove. That most murderers profess Christianity on the scaffold is well known. Here is one case which is an illustration of nine out of ten: George Weems, lately sentenced to be hanged in Des Moines, Iowa, for murder, wrote the following in a letter to a friend just after his trial:

If I ever have to hang, I will hang an innocent man; for as true as there is a God above, I am innocent, and will claim my innocence to the grave. Then I won't have to claim it, for I will stand an innocent man in the books of God. I haven't got the least bit of fear, for I know I will pass into eternal life, and will meet those who have gone before me.

Fortunately, we have definite data to test the truth of this oft-made Christian claim. Figures are generally reliable, and figures prove that the great mass of criminals are either Christian believers today, or received a Christian training in youth. This is true the world over, so true that in most of our state's prison reports, while the nativity, crime, personal habits, etc., of the inmates are given, the religious officials are ashamed to give their religious belief. A comparison of the reports of sixteen or seventeen states will tear the Christian religion from its imaginary high pedestal, and show that as a preventer of crime it is a failure, and on this score no apology can be made for its existence.

In all cases the latest reports have been used when attainable. Some states reported the religious standing of criminals several years ago, but do so no longer, and here the last one issued has been used.

About two years ago the Christian Advocate, Methodist organ, made this admission:

In Sing Sing there are fifteen hundred and fifteen men. There are among them about one hundred men who, in the past, have been connected with Protestant churches as members. There are at least fifty who have confessed their sinfulness and have professed to find God's favor. Of all those fifteen hundred and fifteen men fifty-five per cent are nominally Roman Catholics, and forty-five per cent nominally Protestants. Of the whole number ninety per cent went to Sunday-school when boys.

PENNSYLVANIA, 1883.

During this year there were received into the state penitentiary of the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, 402 white males, 12 white females, 69 negro males, 7 negro females—a total of 490. One hundred and fifteen of these were under 21 years old, and all but nine had been Sunday-school pupils. Of the entire 490, only 44 had not been attendants at Sunday-school. We have here the records of sixteen states, and one province of Canada. No one can say that we have taken an unfair basis for an estimate. The statistics are all official, and all prepared by persons whose interests or prejudices would lead them to favor Christianity. No more have been given because they were not to be obtained. With the exception of two or three states, all reports were made within the last five years. We find the number of convicts in all of these prisons to be 33,168. This is quite a class. Those whose early training included the Christian religion, either by parental instruction or by attendance at Sunday-school, and those who were members of the church in later years number 29,906. Among the others, 3 are recorded as Infidels, 29 as Jews, Buddhists, and other non-Christians, and 3,229 as having been directly under the influence of no religion. That is to say, there are as many preachers in prison in one state as there are Infidels in seventeen states! Although the church membership of the United States is less than one-third of the total population, fully seven-eighths of the criminal population have had the direct influence of Christianity in the molding of their characters. This ought to silence forever those who say that the church is the preserver of morality, peace, and good order.

MISSIONARIES.

Millions of dollars are annually raised to send the gospel of Christ to the heathen. The pulpiteer shouts himself hoarse and sheds rivers of tears for the "poor pagan" in darkness, ignorant of salvation. For the last hundred years missionaries have been at work, and not more than four million converts have been made. Yet Christian manners and customs have been introduced into heathen lands, and what is the result? Are the heathens any better than they were before? The archdeacon of Bombay says that for every Christian made in India they have made one hundred drunkards. Here, as in the United States, statistics come to our aid. The Tablet, a Roman Catholic organ published in London, Eng., throws this light upon the subject:

The newly published official reports about the material and moral conditions of natives in India give a very interesting contribution to the now-discussed mission question. It appears from the figures that not alone do we, by converting the natives to our belief, decidedly lower their moral status, but the standpoint of their natural morality is so high that although they become Christians, we can not make them so immoral as we ourselves are. The figures, which show the comparative moral status among the different classes, are as follows: European, 1 out of 274; Nativ Christian, 1 out of 709; Hindoos, 1 out of 1861; Eurasian, 1 out of 509; Mohammedans, 1 out of 856; Buddhists, 1 out of 3787. The last figure is a tribute to the noble purity of Buddhism, but the statistics impart to us here at home another teaching, that as regards our social life, we would do better if we, for a generation or two, contributed our superfluous pennies and our energies to the moral improvement of our own countrymen, in place of trying to destroy the morality and religion of other people, people who, in truth, could send us their missionaries to convert us.

Here we see that the Europeans, who represent Christianity, are the most criminal portion of the population. The native Christians, the fruit of the missions, are the most criminal of the natives of the country (the Eurasians being the descendants of Europeans and native mothers). Is it not time that people realized the fraud and folly of Christian missions?

CONCLUSION.

We have not taken the ground that the Christians who appear on these criminal calendars were driven to crime by their religion. It is not necessary to do this. It might be that many of them who committed offenses were in their practical life indifferent to religion. This, however, does not alter the case in the least. The fact still remains that the Christianity which was given them for their guide in life was insufficient and failed to appeal to their higher natures. Christian morality is not founded on a solid basis. It rests upon a superstition, a delusion, a falsehood. It is not based upon what we know, or what can be proven, but upon the unknown. True morality must be founded upon the reason, the facts and experiences of life. Christianity says we should do right because God tells us to, when neither the word of God nor the word of man can make an action right or wrong. Neither does anyone know what God's word is. It says, Do right that you may attain eternal life, whereas, if there be a future state, it must be a fact of nature, and our existence in this life is positiv proof that if there be another we will exist there, independently of our conduct here. Christianity tells us to do right for the sake of reward in heaven, but it places the reward and punishment so far away that their influence is not felt in this world. It teaches that the effects of a cause can be abolished, and all the penitent will be forgiven. In addition to this, it tells us to renounce this world for the sake of another; to resist not evil, encourage poverty, glorify sorrow and pain, and abjure reason. This being true, we are compelled to admit that if a Christian does act morally he does so, not because of his religion, but in spite of it. The advancement of knowledge and the cultivation of science have non-plused theology, and are to-day the only forces that work for the elevation of man. These forces have so civilized Christianity that it can live in the present although advancing thought has left it far in the distant past.

Progress and Regress.

It may seem at times as if we were not making much progress; but once in a while a sign of the times flashes out, and we see the fruit of long years of work. The following from the Chicago Times shows a great progress in the public mind, which would not be but for the strenuous labors of organized Freethought. The action of the school board in the state of the famous "blue laws" and the comments of the press thereon are really surprising and significant:

THE LORD'S PRAYER IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

One need not question either the beauty or the universality of the Lord's prayer and still be convinced that the school board of Ansonia, Conn., did the proper thing in ordering that the practice of reciting it in the schools be discontinued. Religious exercises of any kind are out of place in public schools. Many may deplore the religious indifference of our schools as detrimental to the proper spirit in which educational work should be carried on. This is their private privilege to believe. But our schools are supported by taxation. They, the religiously minded, as well as the irreligiously disposed, are made by law to contribute to the maintenance of these schools. Moreover, the pupils come from homes of all sorts of religious and non-religious sympathies and affiliations. Parents may be Protestants or pagans, Jews or Catholics, Turks or Buddhists, Theists or Agnostics; and though one or the other class may represent the numerical majority, the rights of never so small a minority cannot be invaded. Religion is out of place in our common schools.

It is contended that the Lord's prayer is of such transcending sublimity that those cannot be many who would object to its use. This argument fails to grasp the principle involved. The Lord's prayer, an anthology of the best and noblest aspiration of the old Jewish ritual, has, indeed, come to be the most touching expression of the deepest and most sacred yearnings of the hearts of those that pray. It is true it is the universal prayer. Christians of all denominations use it, and the Jews of the liberal school who remember that it is the echo of their own liturgy, will not object on religious grounds to its recital wherever it is in place. But Agnostics do not pray, and Atheists cannot consistently pray. They have a right to ask that their children shall not be brought under religious influences which they hold injurious, or be made to participate in exercises which they deem, even if harmless, a sheer waste of time. Religion and state are divorced in our political system. Hence, as a matter of religious exercise, even the Lord's prayer is out of place in our schools.

On the other hand the danger still to be met, and the necessity of eternal vigilance is seen in this declaration of the pope. I find this in the Chicago Tribune:

POPE LEO SAYS A WORD TO RULERS.

Rome, Dec. 24.—The pope has decided to receive the officers of the United States cruiser Detroit at noon Wednesday. The American officers will be introduced by Mgr. O'Connell, and will be afterwards entertained at an official dinner, which will be given at the American College. His holiness, in a speech to the pontifical household yesterday, said: "The faith is reviving among nations who have come to recognize that civic virtues and laws are not sufficient to restrain the masses. It is therefore of great importance that all should work together for the purpose of making religion a force in public as well as in private life. It is the duty of rulers to lend their support to religious creeds."

S. P. P.

The Sermon on the Mount.

VI.

Mat. vi, 19-34: "Lay not up for yourself treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal. For where thy treasure is there will thy heart be also. . . . Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought [New Version, "Be not anxious"] for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than the meat, and the body than the raiment? Behold the fowls of the air; for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? . . . And why take ye thought for [or, "Are ye anxious concerning," N. V.] raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not; neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. . . . Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Therefore take no thought ["Be not anxious," N. V.] saying, What shall we eat, or what shall we drink, or wherewithal shall we be clothed? (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek:) for your heavenly father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. Take therefore no thought ["Be not anxious," N. V.] for the morrow; for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Also, to the young man, Jesus said: "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me" (Mat. x, 21).

All the injunctions in these quotations have the same bearing as "Blessed are ye poor," etc., and are equally mischievous. If followed, there would be an end to thrift and industry; civilization would cease, and the whole world be reduced to the condition of shiftless beggary peculiar to the oriental nations which have become degraded into a state little better than that of human cattle by their equally impractical ideas. Such teaching serves to show how narrow and limited were Jesus's ideas of life, and how hopelessly the "poor in spirit" give way to despair. Possibly the condition of Galilee was then such that small harm could be done there by such advice. But when the person giving it is elevated upon a pedestal and made to give counsel for all times and places, the effect is mischievous in the extreme. If Jesus were a god his folly was extreme; and whether God or man he was lacking in common sense and knowledge of the world. He may be said to have been extremely original and "unique" in the intensity with which he discouraged thrift, industry, and enterprise; here again his "originality," his "uniqueness," is most immoral.

Many of the remarks already made with regard to his glorification of poverty of spirit and purse in the so-called "Beatitudes" will apply here. As Greg (p. 51) says, "In spite of this emphatic warning, riches have been the most general pursuit of Christians in all ages, and among all classes, with rare exceptions in the monkish ages. Nay more, the most really Christian nations have been and still are the most devoted to the pursuit of gain; the most rigidly and ostentatiously Christian sections of those nations—shall we say the Quakers and the Scotch?—have been among the steadiest and most quietly successful in the search. Nor do they even affect to fancy that they are wrong or disobedient in thus eagerly striving for that wealth which their master so distinctly ordered them to eschew; they put aside or pass by his teaching with a sort of staring unconsciousness, as if it in no way concerned them; with a curious unanimity they vote his exhortations obsolete, abstract, or inapplicable; the most respectable of the religious world give one day to their savior, and six days to their ledger." Confucius, born 551 B. C., said, "If a man take no thought about what is distant, he will find sorrow near at hand." Mencius, born about 371 B. C., said: "The way of the people is this—if they have a certain livelihood they will have a fixed heart. If they have not a certain livelihood, they have not a fixed heart. And if they have not a fixed heart, there is nothing which they will not do in the way of self-abandonment, of moral deflection, of depravity, of wild license."

There is no result of human experience so certain as that if men will not make provision for something more than their daily needs they will, as Confucius says, "find sorrow near at hand." Sickness, accidents, many occasions will arise when, if no provision has been put by for such times, want and misery must follow. Jesus is not content with telling you not to lay up treasures on earth, but you are not to toil or spin at all; you are not to sow or reap, or to gather into barns. "The lilies of the field toil not, neither do they spin." Yet they are arrayed; the fowls of the air do not sow, reap, or gather into barns, yet God feeds them; and are you not better than they? God knows that you need these things, and if you rely on him first you will have these things from him. Nothing was ever more untrue—and the pretended Christian follower of Jesus knows it as well as any one—than that God will provide for you if you do not do it yourself. The most believing and confiding missionary, the one the most ardent in his faith, would not go out to his work without making full provision for all the future possibilities that he could conceive of, nor in everyday life does any sane person do so. There have been ages in the history of the Christians when some men have done so, and the experiment was so fruitful in disastrous and frightful results that the idea has long since been abandoned by the most ardent believers. There was a time when these precepts of Jesus were carried to their legitimate conclusions, amazing as it may seem, and a number of men in Mesopotamia, doing no work, lived and died, grazing in the field with the common herd, and earned the name of Boskoi, or grazing monks (Gibbon, Hist. Christ., p. 580).

The doctrine of Jesus on these points is nothing but the inauguration of an organized system of mendicancy, and Judas was his treasurer. He is perpetually bidding those he comes across to give all they have to the poor; and in the parable of the unjust steward (Luke xvi) who swindled his master, Jesus justifies the steward for making friends of the master's debtors by reducing their debts before he was discharged, and says, "I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness; that when it shall fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations" (Luke xvi, 4, 5). What lofty moral teachings! Mendicancy, unfaithfulness to trusts; and then remember that with all his preaching against thrift, he and his disciples had a purse for Judas the treasurer to take care of, and that Jesus had made "friends" with the mammon of unrighteousness sufficiently to be laid, at the end, in a rich man's tomb (Mat. xxvii, 57-60).

In this instance, as in most others, Jesus has borrowed the ground-work from the Old Testament, and then perverted it. The preacher, in Ecclesiastes (chapter ii), does lament that the result of all his labor and riches is vanity, vanity, but all through it he makes the distinction that though all is vanity it is in that he is a sinner because he used his riches with folly (ii, 7), used them without satisfaction, or joy of his heart, and to no good end; and to sum up, the preacher, while not seeing any difference in the final result between the rich and the poor, still counsels us to make the best of things as they are, but Jesus takes his ideas in mental reservation and from them counsels us to make the worst of things.

In the sense that Jesus meant it is not true that the lilies toil not; they toil incessantly; their roots are sent down into the ground and through them they gather the nourishment that is needed. It is not even true that they take no thought for the morrow. They have a period in which, owing to changes in the season, such as cold and drouth, they cannot any longer gather nourishment from the soil; but during their growing season they have been storing up starch within their bulbs for sustenance in time of need and when they have no means of obtaining it otherwise. What is that but taking thought for the morrow? The vegetable world is full of such instances of "gathering into barns." The "fowls of the air," too, toil incessantly in search of food, and if they do not gather into barns it is because they do what is the same thing, they seek "fresh fields and pastures new." If they remained where food had given out, and relied on God to feed them, they would soon starve.

CHAS. B. COOPER.

Putnam in North Dakota.

A Fargo, N. D., paper has this to say of S. P. Putnam's lecture on "The Great Religious Conspiracy": "The speaker, in his usual forcible manner, illustrated clearly that the aims and objects of the Christian associations are a union of the church and state. He said that while, perhaps, it was done unconsciously by many of the adherents of these various associations, their own declarations and resolutions in convention assembled proved it to be a fact. Mr. Putnam scored the Roman church for its attempt to accomplish this purpose, and also severely arraigned the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the national Prohibition party, and the White Caps for being guilty of the same thing; and he was even suspicious of the Populist party for having a little religion in its platform. Mr. Putnam's series of lectures this week has been of great interest to all investigators for religious truth, and they much regret that he can be no longer with them."

News and Notes.

I have to travel nearly two thousand miles from one lecture appointment to another—from Minnesota to New Mexico. On Wednesday night, Dec. 26, I left Chicago. Passing through Kansas, the thermometer was 5 degrees below zero, and a snowstorm was driving, but by the time we got to Colorado the sun was out again, and warm weather greeted me in New Mexico. It seems like a different world, the scenery, people, etc., are so unlike what we experience in Dakota; and it impresses the imagination with the wonderful variety of our country.

I arrive at San Marcial Saturday morning, and receive a cordial welcome from the few stalwart Liberals here. I lecture the same evening to a small audience, which increases somewhat on the following Sunday.

San Marcial is a railroad town. The shops of the Santa Fé are located here. It is the end of a division. The working people are mostly of a liberal mind. The Mexicans are not open to new ideas. They are in the fold of the church of Rome. Besides this ancient church, there are an Episcopalian and a Methodist church here in a population of less than one thousand.

On Sunday morning, with my friend W. J. Ribley, I attend the Methodist services in a little adobe building—for most of the houses here are of adobe, which affords a cheap and strong material for shelter, giving warmth in winter and coolness in summer. The only objection is that if a big rain comes up—a waterspout, for instance—it is likely to dissolve the adobe, and the dwelling returns to its original mud. This sometimes happens, but usually there are only gentle showers, and the sun shines more or less every day in the year.

The Methodist preacher here is a young man and is just entering upon his career. They call him the Cowboy Preacher. He is a Texan and has the exuberance of the Southern temperament. He is very impetuous in his delivery; his gestures are truly extraordinary, and his whole body is on the move. He is dramatic in his oratory, and his voice is like the voice of the whirlwind. But it was really refreshing to hear one who evidently believed every word that he said. He has not yet acquired the polish of hypocrisy. He has a rude, wild eloquence, as if he saw the very flames of hell and the glories of heaven. There is good raw material in him, I should judge. He is a child of nature, has the poetic disposition, and this great Western country has penetrated him with its sublimity of scenery and its untamed beauty. I guess his conversion was a genuine affair, and that floods of divine grace have been poured in upon his soul, and he revels in the heavenly effulgence. He certainly would not please an orthodox audience down East. He would scare them out of their wits. It was quite a study of primitive Christianity, this burning faith, founded upon pure ignorance, which utterly disdains science. It requires a picture of this sort to realize how vast even now are the superstitions of humanity. It was as if, in attending this little church on the banks of the Rio Grande, I had been transported back eighteen centuries, to the fervors of the first disciples. There was not a hint of modern science or modern thought. It is one of the remarkable phenomena of human history that this blind faith still exists, notwithstanding the power of civilization. It is useless to say that we have no longer a dark theology to oppose—that it is of the dead past. We have but to attend our churches to note that the belief of the Dark Ages is still an enormous living force. With educated people to-day Christianity is a glittering humbug, but with the unthinking masses it is an awful reality. Here is a young man who evidently has some natural brightness, who has been a workingman, he says, who has had experience of the world, and yet like a very child he is completely bound in the chains of faith and fear. His very sincerity is a vivid illustration of the depths of human ignorance, which must be constantly guarded against; for as occasionally over this fair and sunny landscape, which day after day presents so beautiful an appearance, breaks the waterspout with tremendous desolations, so in the very face of our civilization heaves at times the ignorance and superstition of humanity, and infinit ruin is the result. It won't do to say that the cruel and barbarous theology of the past is no more. Among millions of people in our land it rules as with a rod of iron.

These are the first lectures I have ever given in

New Mexico. I suppose that many think that this is a savage country and that Freethought can find but little encouragement. But New Mexico has a bright future before it. The railroads are opening up the country. Its resources are being developed. It is a good place for farming. Alfalfa can be produced in almost any quantity. Among the foothills fruit can be easily cultivated. There are extensive and fertile ranges for cattle. Judging by my friend Ribley's backyard, it is favorable for chickens and eggs. The climate is generally free from malaria. Whole sections of the territory are underlaid with coal. In gold, silver, copper, and lead it equals any state. There are excellent marble quarries. There are manufactures, especially of rope from the wonderful yucca plant. The population is upwards of 165,000 besides the Indians. It has a prosperous school system, the value of its school buildings being over $500,000. These few facts show that Freethought also can flourish in New Mexico, for it has the elements of a high civilization, since material wealth is necessary to intellectual wealth, and New Mexico is certainly not lacking in the facilities for good living.

Those who come in with the railroads are generally men of a progressive character, who are fond of adventure, change, and who have pluck and energy and inventive skill. They say that all the Mexican wants is a cigaret, sunshine, and plenty of pepper. The American, however, who comes in here wants everything. He is an all-round man, and he proposes to have the best that is going. I should say he was a "rustler," only that word does not mean what it does down East. It means in this country a cattle thief. I reckon the word "hustler" will do, as I do not understand that term to be used in any bad signification.

I find a sturdy Freethought element at San Marcial, although there are many who are afraid to say exactly what they think. In New Mexico, as elsewhere, there is the "fence" and many people are on it. I hope to do something on this campaign, and leave the way open for future work. At present it is a "struggle for existence." We are not by any means in the "swim." I couldn't, however, find a better companionship for pioneer effort.

I am staying at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Ribley, and enjoy their generous hospitality. On this "Happy New Year" I am writing these notes on the first day of 1895, and certainly the auspices are bright, for the sun is shining over the broad plains and making all the clouds silvery, and the mesa stretches away into the blue distance, and the vast mountains encircle the horizon with resplendent crowns of snow.

My jovial host, Mr. W. J. Ribley, is a railroad man, an old-time subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER, an Infidel from away back, a traveler and a citizen of the world. From the Atlantic to the Pacific he has had varied experiences of human life. He has always put his shoulder to the wheel. He has bought and distributed large quantities of Freethought literature, and added materially to the list of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mrs. Ribley is equally earnest in her Liberal convictions, and Clyde, the little boy, is a Freethinker by inheritance, and holds his own with the natural logic of childhood. So I pass my days pleasantly in this Freethought home, and I can take the ups and downs of the campaign with a cheerful spirit, and have faith in human progress.

Mr. A. B. Ely is another staunch supporter of the cause. He generously grants the use of his hall for all the six lectures here. Without this cordial co-operation it would be impossible to carry on my labors. But as long as Mr. Ely furnishes a free hall, and friend Ribley a place to sleep and support for the inner man, I can stick to the post without any faith at all, for I have the substance.

I feel quite well acquainted with comrade Joseph McQuillin, since he came from Pawtucket, Mass., only a few miles from where I used to live. Out in this big Western country we feel as if we were neighbors if we come from the same state back East.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Tibbitts, Isaac Holloway, formerly from Salem, Ohio, the old camping-ground of antislavery Freethought; Fred Horn, Burt Hickock, Fred Griffith, and Leo Lowenstein, are on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER and stand by their colors. I do not know that I could find more loyal friends among which to begin the new year's work than at San Marcial.

I received a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL at Chicago. This is an elegant book, full of good things from a variety of sources. It has the poetry, facts, and eloquence of Freethought in its splendid pages. It came upon my pilgrim journey like an inspiration. I am sure that every Freethinker needs possess this beautiful landmark of the world's progress.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

January 1, 1895.

Observations.

The People, a Socialist paper published in this city, is guilty of fraudulent practices. The editor clips a sentence from an Observation printed over my name, omits the "I" belonging to it, and then charges my errors to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Here is what I said:

I conceive that with nine-tenths of our people owning a few acres of land, producing what they consume and something more, and reading THE TRUTH SEEKER every week, we should have a nation which few foreigners would care to tackle in debate.

Whereat the editor of the People exclaims:

"A few acres of land," on which to produce what one "consumes and something more," and that in the United States in the year of grace 1894, is a good joke! None of the clergymen whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is habitually going for could get off a better, seeing that we have arrived at such a period of our industrial development when it is established that 260 acres are the minimum needed by a farmer to keep his head above water.

I yield those remarks to the tender consideration of my agricultural friends, with the inquiry whether or not they are true. At the same time I would throw out the suggestion, tentatively, that a man who can not get a living off less than 260 acres of land which he owns unencumbered will not be benefited by keeping his head above water. He needs to soak it.

Ah, there! Anthony Comstock. So you belong to the gang of blackmailers, too, do you? You would dismiss a case against a "green goods" dealer for and in consideration of a "donation" of $1,000. I am not at all surprised to hear that you took the money; the astonishing part of the story is that you kept your promise and stopped the action against Streep. Perhaps your man Britton was acting under your orders when he approached one of D. M. Bennett's printers with a proposition to fix the case of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER for a moderate compensation. If Bennett had not been a good fighter, and if he had allowed you to blackmail him, I do not imagine that you would have pursued him any farther. I suppose you thought that under your pious mask, and with the Young Men's Christian Association to hold it on, you could prosecute your work of extortion until you were rich enough to retire. You ought to retire now—to the penitentiary. By the way, what an artful old dodger was your president, the pious Wm. E. Dodge. How neatly he defrauded the custom-house by importing block tin in the form of works of art! Then how slyly Colgate advertised his vaseline and salicylic acid combination as a preventive in cases for which there is no cure! They were peaches that ripened and rotted. You are a daisy that has been struck by a late frost.

Discussing protection and the tariff, in Chicago, the other day, Colonel Ingersoll is reported to have spoken in this way:

What are the markets of the world? We manufacture absolutely nothing that we can sell at a profit in England, France, or any other country in Europe.

The surface showing of this statement is that Colonel Ingersoll has been misrepresented, as during the year ending June 30, 1894, our exports of manufactured articles, according to figures published in the New York Times, amounted to almost or quite two hundred millions of dollars. That was 15 per cent of the total exportation, and 15 to 85 may be about the proportion of our manufactures to our production of raw material. Not all of these exports went to Europe, but some of them did, while all of them must have been sold in competition with European goods, and that is the same thing when the cheapness of production is the question discussing. Somebody ought to tell the truth about the tariff.

When Mowbray, the bumptious revolutionist from England, made a wild speech in Philadelphia, the police arrested him. The Friendship Liberal League, on the contrary, appointed a speaker to answer the statements and arguments of Mowbray; and I will bet a dozen bombs that the address before the Liberal League did more than the arrest to discourage the "propaganda by deed" among those who heard it. Mr. T. B. Wakeman's remarks published in THE TRUTH SEEKER last week contain the true doctrine and go to the root of the matter: The country needs more Liberal clubs and Leagues.

J. Wm. Lloyd, the philosophical poet, who has written a whole lot of good truck, contemplates bunching his scattered poems and publishing them in a book. For a title to the volume he has chosen "Wind-Harp Songs," which is open to the objection that songs cannot be sung to a wind-harp accompaniment, but still it has the merit of suggesting the proper afflatus. Mr. Lloyd's volume will appear when two hundred persons have agreed to take it at $1 per copy. He resides at Westfield, N. J.

The book reviewer of the Evening Wisconsin, a paper published in some jay town in the Northwest, assaults my reputation as a religious poet by saying that THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL "also contains so-called verse of a blasphemous character." That the verse is blasphemous I am pleased to be assured, but I must point out that the reviewer errs in qualifying it as "so-called." It has not been so denominated. Every journalist knows that verse is just verse, the same as a line is a line. It may not be poetry, nor even rhyme, but it is never prose. The Wisconsin reviewer does not know why he uses the term "so-called," and I shall have to enlighten him. It is for the same reason, or want of reason, that the editor of a paper somewhere in his vicinity alluded to Putnam as a "so-called Freethinker," thereby obversely implying, I suppose, that he might be a Methodist in disguise. The word has the same poverty of significance as the parenthesized interrogation point (?) of the rural scribe, merely indicating, when employed as in the cases noted, that the bosom of the writer is agitated by emotions which he has not self-control enough to conceal, and which he does not know enough to express.

Mr. Charles C. Johnson, of Massachusetts, and the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, in discussing 1 Cor. vii, 36, missed certain beauties of the passage unrevealed to Bible students who retain the old version. In the new version of our lord and savior's last will and testament the verse is as follows: "But if any man thinketh that he behaveth himself unseemly toward his virgin daughter, if she be past the flower of her age, and if need so requireth, let him do what he will; he sinneth not; let them marry." The revisers, who are responsible for the introduction of the daughter in the case, say in a marginal note: "Or, virgin (omitting daughter)." This matter needs further elucidation. In the first place, what sort of a piece of property is a man's virgin unless it is his daughter? Could it mean his servant girl, his sister, or his aunt? What kind of sense does the annotator make of Paul's words if he omits daughter? and if he retains the word, what sort of morals do they inculcate? While the Christian citizen might thank Paul for the liberty of the household so kindly accorded him, he owes the annotator something for permitting him to omit or include his daughter when behaving himself unseemly.

The onus frumenti is on Brother Green of the Freethinkers' Magazine. Mr. Green's complaint against the Liberal press in general is that it does not give the purity issue sufficient protuberance. He thinks that unless Infidels can see the Comstock law and go it one better, they might as well remain in the church. He lately heard that C. C. Moore, of the Blue Grass Blade, was making a specialty of morals, and at once wrote a letter in which he extended the right hand and handwriting of fellowship and indorsement to Mr. Moore. It gratified Mr. Green to find a brother moralist, and besides requesting an exchange of journals, he asked permission to print Mr. Moore's likeness, whiskers and all, in the February number of his magazine. The letter pleased Mr. Moore so well that he printed it, but in the same number of the Blade he gave his readers about two columns of red-hot free love doctrine, while right next to Mr. Green's communication appeared a logical and well-argued defense of Mr. J. B. Wise, now under indictment for violating the postal laws. Mr. Green can now say with the poet:

'Twas ever this way up to date,
I've seen my fondest hopes decay;
I never found congenial mate
But he was first to break away.

The Lexow investigating committee has rested from its labors and its works do follow it. The atmosphere is full of charges against all whom it may concern. Boss Platt has withdrawn from the Rev. Dr. Parkhurst's church, with the stinging remark that the pastor's head hath grown too great for his hat. The Rev. Dr. Parkhurst avers in an open letter that Goff made a corrupt deal with Police Superintendent Byrnes, and that the said Byrnes is a public liar. He also charges that Mr. Byrnes has held a mortgage on the investigating committee. Chairman Lexow contributes an item of intelligence to the effect that Parkhurst dodged the issue when it came to facing the music of Byrnes's voice, and artfully feigned illness for that purpose. The record of Recorder Goff as district attorney is being overhauled with a view to making trouble for him; and taking everything into consideration, the condition of affairs approaches that state when honest men are supposed to get what is coming to them.

It is proposed to make the investigating committee a permanent American institution. This may be done. It would be merely adding to the political machine one more wheel, which, being properly greased, would run as slick as the old ones.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Freethought Progress.

The German Freethinkers are at present having a rest from persecution.

Bishop Gillaspie, of the Episcopal church, is greatly alarmed by the growth of what he calls "Unitarianism" in the Episcopal body, particularly among the clergy. When the shepherds go astray into the fields of heresy, what is to become of the sheep?

Mr. Leon Farnemont, editor of La Raison, and Prof. Hector Denis, of the University of Brussels, both prominent Freethinkers, have been elected to the Belgian Chamber of Deputies. The National Congress held at Brussels, September 12th, was a great success. Our Belgian brethren show as much activity and enthusiasm as ever.

October 15th was the anniversary of the death of Ramon Chies, the great Spanish Freethinker. Memorial services have been held by all Spanish Freethought societies and several Masonic lodges. A copy of El Libre Examen, one of our Spanish contemporaries, lies before us. This journal, which is not yet a year old, has under the management of Carlos Chies succeeded in gaining a place among the foremost European Freethought journals. It is spicy and uncompromisingly anti-Christian.

The two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Voltaire was the 21st of November last. To commemorate the event and help on the cause of mental liberty for which the great Frenchman did so much, Mr. J. M. Wheeler, of the London Freethinker, wrote a popular account of the emancipator's career, accompanied by telling excerpts from his writings, the opinions entertained of him by many writers, and other matter of interest. During the month of September two new societies joined the French Freethought Federation. This Federation held its annual congress Nov. 1st in Paris.

The contents of Der Lichtfreund, which since the death of Dr. E. Schwelle, May 18, 1894, has been edited by Mr. D. Panthl, are interesting and instructive as ever. Theologischer Nonsensometer is a very able translation by Mr. Wolfgang Schaumburg, of Vienna, Austria, of Col. R. G. Ingersoll's "Talmagian Catechism." Mr. W. Schaumburg deserves the appreciation and thanks of all Freethinkers for his translations of American Freethought literature into the German language. Besides the one noticed above he has translated the "Mistakes of Moses," "Men, Women, and Gods," John Peck's "Miracles and Miracle Workers," and others.

A collected edition of the works of James Thomson (B. V.) was issued in London by Bertram Dobell in November. Fisher Urwin of London publishes in two volumes the life of Charles Bradlaugh by his daughter, Hypatia Bradlaugh Bonner. ($5.) The edition of the Agnostic Annual for 1895 was exhausted almost immediately and now Watts & Co. have issued in pamphlet form the symposium on "Why Liv a Moral Life?" Robert Forder issued a subscribers' edition of J. M. Wheeler's "Voltaire: His Life and Work." It was limited to 250 copies. The late Prof. G. J. Romanes left behind him the manuscript of a work styled "Thoughts on Religious Problems." The work is being edited, and will have a preface supplied, by the Rev. Charles Gore, of "Lux Mundi" fame. The London Freethinker says: "An excited appellant stood before Lord Justice Lopes, the Master of the Rolls, and demanded 'in the name of God who reigned over earth, heaven, and hell, over angels, men, and devils,' that his case should be investigated. The Master of the Rolls dismissed the application and censured the appellant for uttering 'nonsense' in 'a loud voice.' That little trick doesn't impose on the authorities as it used to in the old 'Thus saith the Lord' days." Think of a judge telling a man in court that the latter's appeal to "God" was "nonsense"! THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Missionary Scheme" has already found wise imitators. Messrs. Watts & Co., publishers of the excellent Literary Guide, London, read of the success of our movement and at once offered to send to different addresses eight copies of F. J. Gould's novel, "The Agnostic Island," for $1.25. Slowly but surely the practice of cremation is spreading. In England crematoriums have been proposed in Liverpool, Southampton, and Paddington. At last a minister has ventured to do justice to the memory of George Eliot and George Henry Lewes. Rev. W. Mottram writes to the Review of Reviews in their vindication. He avers that "there was no injured wife in the background." The Freethinker thus summarizes a portion of his article: "It was Mr. Lewes who would, by our law, be entitled to a divorce. But divorce then was not only costly and most troublesome, but a special act of Parliament had to be obtained and paid for. George Henry Lewes was then poor. George Eliot rebelled against a law like that, and felt her union with Lewes strictly moral. She considered it one of the chief blessings of her life, and the source of inspiration which, in all likelihood, we should never have had otherwise in George Eliot at all. Mr. Cross, her second husband, thought her union with Lewes 'the noblest act of a very noble life.'" A contributor to the Toronto Mail quotes from Lady Dorothy Orford's biography of her father a letter written by Lord Orford refusing to become president of the Norwich Bible Society. The letter is refreshingly candid, and reads as follows: "Sir: I am surprised and annoyed by the contents of your letter. Surprised, because my well-known character should have exempted me from such an application, and annoyed, because it compels me to have even this communication with you. I have long been addicted to the gaming-table. I have lately taken to the turf. I fear I frequently blaspheme. But I have never distributed religious tracts. All this was known to you and your society, notwithstanding which you think me a fit person to be your president. God forgive your hypocrisy. I would rather live in the land of sinners than with such saints." Equally candid was the answer of the Marquis de Biddle Cope when asked in a very flattering letter written by the Duke of Norfolk, president of the Catholic Union, to become a member of that influential body. Here is the reply: "Broadward Hall, Aston-on-Clun, Shropshire, November 13, 1894. My Dear Lord Duke: I have pleasure in acknowledging receipt of your letter of October 31st, postmarked November 6th. I embrace the opportunity thus offered to mention that I am unable to reconcile belief in supernatural agencies with the credence of facts now ascertained by scientific research. On this ground I decline with many thanks your polite offer to promote my enrollment in the Catholic Union. I think it a duty of courtesy to mention at the same time that I have ceased to use the title of Marquis granted by the Sovereign Pontiff. To prevent possible misapprehensions, I propose to publish this correspondence.—Very truly yours, CYPRIAN DE BIDDLE COPE."

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason," and the "Story Hour." I have received and read "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and I think it one of the best books I ever read.

Friend Putnam is deserving of great credit, and I hope he will make a fortune out of it. There are other books I would like to have, but money is too scarce at the present time.

Down with superstition, and success to Freethought. A. M. HILTS.

HAMBURG, CAL., Nov. 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: This being the day set apart by the president as a day of humiliation and prayer, amen, I take the liberty of acknowledging receipt of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which I have read twice through, and pronounce it grand, superb, magnificent. As the Frenchman says, Creedal cussedness must be kept in bounds. I am 70 years old with fair prospects of living long enough to read the books ordered herewith, "The Better World," "About the Holy Bible," "For Her Daily Bread," "Secular Marriage and Funeral Ritual," "Church Property," "Reynolds's Blasphemy Trial."

Pleased With His Present.

DEEP RIVER, CONN., Dec. 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which my wife ordered a week ago as a Christmas present, I received Christmas Eve, and was very much surprised as well as pleased. I wish that some more Freethinkers' wives would do the same. I have looked it through and am satisfied that it is more than all you say it is. I hope that all of the good and true men and women who are working for truth and Freethought may live long to see a great deal of their work accomplished.

CASPER LIGHTSINGER.

A Secular Funeral in Arkansas.

ROGERS, ARK., Dec. 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.25 for a year's subscription and Ingersoll's lecture on the Bible. I have been slow to pay subscription, but feel sure you will pardon me when you know the cause; my husband was taken sick last January and was not able to be up any more; he was helpless seven months; died the 6th of September. We have always been bold and outspoken Freethinkers. We had a Secular funeral at my husband's grave, conducted by C. W. Stewart, of Rogers, Ark.; he is an able speaker and a faithful worker for the cause. If we only had more such men we would have better times. There have been many remarks made about our funeral. I am, with good wishes to the Freethought cause,

MRS. J. E. LOVELACE.

Mortuary—Walter J. Chipman.

OLYMPIA, WASH., Dec. 19, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Walter J. Chipman died Dec. 14, 1894. He was born Feb. 2, 1858, making him nearly thirty-seven years of age at the time of his death. Stricken down in the prime of manhood, he met death bravely and added one more to the many proofs that an honest Freethinker is not afraid to die. The Christian's future had no horror for him. He suffered for over a year, and the last few months endured terrible agony, for which he could get no relief, the doctors all differing as to the disease, but when an examination was made it was found to be an internal cancer. He wanted no preacher to pray over him, and as there was no Freethought speaker available we had no services. The large number of friends who gathered on the sad occasion showed that he had the respect of the community in which he lived and died. C.

Progress, Even in Pennsylvania.

ARCH SPRING, PA., Dec. 19, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The people here are awful religious; they do not like me for taking THE TRUTH SEEKER. But I give a few copies away when I can get anyone to read them. I have sent some to Tyrone City; there are some people there who will read them. There are men here who will not give me any work on that account, and others who will get work done and beat me out of the pay if they can, and think it no harm. I have been told that I should not serve as a jurymen. I came to this valley in 1857 and the people in this township have spent seventy-five thousand dollars for churches and preachers since I came here, and they glory in it.

I send you $3 for my subscription.

I see that Ingersoll lectured to a crowded house in Altoona a short time ago; he could not have done that ten years ago, so the people are getting their eyes open.

Respectfully, LOUIS EDMISTON.

A Comrade's Fitting Praise.

CLINTON, LA., Dec. 22, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I feel it to be my place to let you know that a staunch friend and admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER has left us. One of the noblest of nature's noblemen has retired after the battle of life. Yesterday, in company with about three hundred of his neighbors, I had the mournful satisfaction of following to his last resting-place the remains of our esteemed brother Leroy Dutton, of Grand Mound, Ia. He lived a useful life till seventy-nine years old, and left the world better for having lived in it. His ideal of a good life was to live from day to day in doing what seemed to him to be for the best to those around him in setting an example of honesty and sobriety, and by his daily life showing the foolishness of superstition. We laid him to rest on his farm about two hundred yards from his late home, between his two wives who had preceded him across the line which divides the known from the unknown. May they sleep undisturbed. The simple but impressive services were conducted by Brother Randall from Chicago.

ONSET, MASS., Dec. 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose $3. I received "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" all right, and have had a real feast for the mind reading it. It is in Mr. Putnam's best style, and that is saying a great deal, when everything he writes is so grand. The portraits are good of all those that I know, and I have no doubt that those I do not know are just as good. I was glad to see a portrait of Voltaire. What a grand face it is! Also good Mr. Seaver and Mendum. It seems good to see them as they used to look in Paine Hall, Boston. I also received Ingersoll's lecture on the "Wickedest Book that ever was Printed." How long would a company of men who would get up such a book now remain out of jail, with Comstock around? How time and distance lend enchantment to that old book! Will inclose stamps for the ANNUAL FOR 1895.

MRS. S. D. FRANCIS.

Insists on Having Questions Answered.

CINCINNATI, O., Dec. 19, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith hand you $3 to pay my subscription for another year to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER.

I have from time to time ordered a good many books from you, and after reading them I loan them to those who can be induced to read them; and in many cases a Christian, after reading one, will ask me if I have any more similar works? In order to get the best of a Christian I think it is only necessary to ask a few questions, and insist on his answering them. There are many things in the Bible that the weakness of my mind prevents me from understanding, and I consider it the Christian's duty to enlighten me, and in his attempts to do so he always makes matters worse.

With best wishes for the success of your paper and a hurrah for Heston, I remain yours for common sense,

M. J. CUNNING.

Wonders Why They are Fooled.

LEWISTOWN, MONT., Dec. 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Now that winter has set in my little family and myself must have something to read. I have read your valuable paper for a good many years and I cannot get along without it. There are many Freethinkers here, but there is no one to stir them up. There are three churches here, and when a man and woman gets so down at the heel that he or she cannot do anything else the church gets a new member. I make it a point to go to church once every six years, and the time came due about three weeks ago, and the talk the preacher gave us was the thinnest truck that I have seen taken in a long while; the only change that I can see is that instead of a hat to gather the Lord's share in they have a dipper. Such a humbug, such a fraud! I cannot see why people cannot see the game; they appear to be smart enough on other points. Well, as I said before, I want something to read. Inclosed find $1.50 for "Crimes of Preachers," "Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures," "Thumbscrew and Rack," "Self-contradictions of the Bible," "My Religious Experience," "A Clergyman's Victims," and "Rights of Man."

Yours for Freethought and liberty,

CHARLES BROWN.

The Labor Exchange.

CADDO, TEX., Dec. 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am about to organize a Labor Exchange Co-operative Colony at this place, and wish to enlist all Liberal and advanced people out of employment. Can you, and will you, help the cause by giving this notice to your many advanced readers in THE TRUTH SEEKER? I mail you to-day, under a separate cover, the Co-operative Commonwealth, in which you will see what property I have to offer. If sixty-four members can pay $125 each ($8,000), I turn all my stock, machinery, implements, etc., over to them. Then I will deposit the land with warranty deed with the Labor Exchange (the members), and take Labor Exchange checks for same redeemable in sheep, wool, cattle, horses, and all kinds of produce, all without interest.

As a reformer, I suppose you are in favor of the co-operative move, and would call your particular attention to the Labor Exchange, the only true co-operative system in existence. It does away with all middle-men and bankers, and gives to each individual full value for his produce.

For information apply to the Progressive Thought Company, Olathe, Kan.

If you can help the cause and the oppressed, you will bestow a blessing upon all mankind, and greatly oblige yours in the cause. Fraternally,

PETER SWENSON.

N.B.—I think we will be ready for an organization about Jan. 15th.

Mortuary—Leroy Dutton.

CHICAGO, ILL., Dec. 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Leroy Dutton, who was born April 20, 1816, in Chenango county, N. Y., passed to death, after a short sickness, on the morning of Dec. 20, 1894, aged seventy-eight years and eight months.

He was highly respected by all who knew him for his exceptional intelligence and many superior qualities of character. He came West in 1839 with his parents and located in Olive, Clinton county, Ia., where he has resided ever since, steadily engaged in the occupation of farming.

Although his parents were strict Presbyterians their ideas of religion, life, and death never found root in his mind. For many years he has been widely known as a Freethinker, and defined himself as a Materialistic philosopher. For some years past he has frequently been heard to express himself that he was satisfied with life and ready to die whenever nature was ready for him. It was his special request that neither priest nor minister should officiate at his funeral; he wished to be laid away in the earth on his farm with as little ceremony as possible, and if any speaker was called by his friends that it would be one whose words would be in harmony with the ideas of life and death which he had lived and believed were in accord with great nature's laws.

The writer was called by the friends to conduct the funeral, which was attended by a large number of people, many of whom for the first time witnessed exercises for such an occasion in which prayers, psalm-singing, nor Bible-reading occurred.

For many years Mr. Dutton has been a generous contributor of means to aid in the propagation of such ideas in relation to life, death, religion, and politics as he thought would destroy superstition and ignorance, and thus help all mankind to larger freedom and to greater enjoyment of the fruits of their toil and their natural rights.

He was a kind neighbor, a loving and tender husband, father, and brother, and an exceptionally useful citizen.

DR. J. H. RANDALL.

Thinks Paine Was a Medium.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Dec. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Paine's "Age of Reason" to be sent to the addresses of the persons named. I approve highly of your plan of sending Paine's "Age of Reason" to Christians, as from my past experience I am satisfied that there is not another book in existence that will have so much influence to set the average Christian to thinking as will that book. The majority of Christians know little or nothing of what the religious views of Paine were, as they have heard so many slanderous lies from their priests that they consider him next in villainy to his satanic majesty himself. I have spoilt more than one Christian's faith by giving him the "Age of Reason" to read. I have wondered sometimes why so many Freethinkers admired Paine when he was a believer in a future life, as they seem to think that such belief savors of the grossest superstition, and it appears to me as though they could hardly find language strong enough to condemn that belief. I am satisfied that Paine was very mediumistic, judging from his writings. He was what now would be called an impressible medium. He says in the "Age of Reason" that thoughts came to him unawares, and that he found it to his advantage to treat such visitors with civility, as it was from such that he had learned all that he knew, or words to that effect. I may not quote verbatim, as it has been years since I read it. Though a crazy Spiritualist, I am doing all that I can to spread Liberal views. I have paid but little attention to Spiritualism for many years, as I commenced its investigation over forty years ago and satisfied myself beyond a doubt. My main hobby of late years is Vegetarianism. Everything in existence partakes of the nature of that of which it is made and men are no exception to the rule. One who lives on the grains, fruits, and nuts will be a very different person from one who eats much animal food, the worst of which is the hog.

Respectfully, A. H. FRANK.

A Clergyman Called Down.

DES MOINES, IA., Dec. 11, 1894.

TO REV. H. A. PRITCHARD, D.D., Indianapolis, Ind.—Rev. Sir: During your recent course of lectures in Des Moines, Ia., you are reported to have made substantially these statements regarding the morality of Infidelity: At one time a certain Infidel started an Infidel town somewhere in Indiana. The inhabitants were all unbelievers. Their moral state was so low that the founder of the place himself left, saying even the devil could not live there. Then, according to the report, you yourself went through the town on a Sunday morning and found all the women out on the streets playing marbles. Now, as you seem to be a leading light in your church, you can possibly give some evidence to substantiate the story. As a public man, the public have a right to demand it of you. I hereby ask you the following questions: 1. Have you been correctly reported? If incorrectly, what is your version of the matter? 2. If your statements have been correctly reported tell us the name of the Infidel who established the town in question. 3. When was it established? 4. In what county of Indiana? 5. Is the town in existence to-day? 6. If not, when did it go out of existence? 7. Have you any evidence to prove its existence yourself, religious papers and tracts excepted? If so, please refer them to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The Infidels of this country would be pleased to obtain some knowledge of this wonderful town, a knowledge which at the present time seems to be treasured in your brain. I have directed a registered copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing this letter to be sent to you. Make your reply to the editor of that journal, who will publish it. Hoping to hear from you at an early date, I am, yours respectfully,

FRANKLIN STEINER.

Believes in Aggressive Work.

COOK, NEB., Dec. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose two leaflets and suggest, in connection with other propagandistic work, that should the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER put a few dimes each into a fund for the purpose of scattering some hundreds in each neighborhood the effect produced would be surprising. I have, for several years, sent out similar slips, and as a consequence the efforts of the church availeth not very much. A year ago the United Brethren church labored hard in a six week's revival, and succeeded in increasing their membership only three. The Methodist Episcopal church started up soon after the closing of the United Brethren, and ran at red heat for nine weeks, and added only five to their membership roll. The Methodist Episcopal are now in the fifth week—running at full blast—four or five preachers almost every night and through the day visiting at the houses, and as yet have three or four only who have expressed any desire to seek the Lord. If the Liberals would be more aggressive it would be but a few years until the influence of the church would scarcely be felt. Many of their houses of superstition would be thrown open to the light of reason, and they would be converted into halls of science and humanitarianism; all their scarecrows would be relegated to the rear, never again to come to the front to frighten weak-minded people out of their wits. People would be taught how to live, instead of being taught how to die. Instead of building huge stone walls with dark and gloomy cells to hold in solitary confinement those who have given their hearts to God until the court fixes upon the time, and the executioner gets ready the scaffold which hurls its victim into eternity, we will teach them that they had better keep their hearts, as they can in no possible way be of any use to God—as well give God your liver or kidney—and you can in no way get along without it. We will crush the rocks and use them in the building of our public roads and making them passable. I will urge in closing, Let every Liberal who reads this buckle on his armor and throw off his timidity and boldly, though courteously, show up the Christian's absurdities.

Yours truly, W. P. BROOKS.

Washington Preachers Greatly Excited.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: When Colonel Ingersoll stepped before the footlights at the National Theater Sunday evening, December 16th, and said that "somebody ought to tell the truth about the Bible," he faced an audience that occupied every seat from pit to dome, while a large number had to content themselves with standing in a semi-circle all around the back row of seats. The Colonel seemed to be in his happiest mood and for nearly two hours he kept the audience either convulsed with laughter at his witty sallies or else held in rapt attention at his fiery denunciation of all that is cruel, inhuman, and barbarous in the "Holy Bible."

Those readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who have either heard or read his new lecture "About the Holy Bible" need not be told how unassailable are the arguments contained therein.

Of all Colonel Ingersoll's lectures I have had the pleasure of listening to, or of all his works I have had the pleasure of reading, I think this one is the most replete with sound reasoning and logic.

No wonder the clergy are dazed, and judging from the numerous "replies" in the various pulpits the Sunday following, they are utterly routed and demoralized. It reminds me of the effect of throwing a stone into a hornet's nest. Such buzzing, such fury run mad with impotent rage, and such wild ravings are enough to make the gods weep.

One enterprising individual whose orthodoxy need not be questioned wanted the district commissioners (corresponding to mayor in your city) to find some law by which to stop "this blatant Infidel" from delivering his lecture. This is what he said: "All right-minded clergymen and Christians, both Protestant and Catholic, do most emphatically and earnestly protest against this blatant Infidel delivering his blasphemous lecture in Washington or elsewhere. Amen."

Then follows a long tirade of abuse and insolence characteristic of those who love their enemies and who turn the left cheek when the right is smitten. This was before the lecture was delivered. You can imagine what it was afterwards.

Of course none of those reverend gentlemen who undertook to "answer" the Colonel's lecture, as they very modestly advertised they would, indulged in anything but denunciations, wild statements, insults, and abuse.

There is need not only of one but a thousand Ingersolls to teach and civilize the orthodox clergy of our land, for I take it they are no better elsewhere than they are here.

J. J. SHIRLEY, M.D.

From a Systematic Worker.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Dec. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The Freethinkers here are unorganized, but several of the leaders last fall discussed the feasibility of having a lecture delivered this season, pledging themselves to give certain stated sums toward defraying the expense thereof. Procrastination, however, let matters hang in this chaotic state until Mr. Remsburg pushed the matter to a climax by writing one of the members with whom he had been corresponding that he would be here to lecture seven days later, and requesting an answer.

Owing to his inability to meet and consult the other leaders, who all lived in the country districts, this letter was left unanswered until just three days before the date on which Mr. Remsburg could lecture. Then, having met, a telegram was hastily sent telling him to come on without fail, and work began in earnest. Fearing that our delayed answer might reach him too late to accept, we nevertheless resolved, in that case, to address the meeting ourselves. Advertisements were inserted in each of Hagerstown's four daily papers, and subscriptions solicited from known Liberals to defray the expenses of the meeting. Two days later we had two thousand handbills struck, which I personally distributed in every business place in town, and to pedestrians and residences as far as they would reach, always saying a few words to the recipient thereof that would arouse his interest in the circular and insure its being read. As a result the hall, one of the largest in Hagerstown, was so well filled that some remained standing.

And this occurred in spite of the warning of Reverend Walton, an itinerant street-preacher, gave all Christians to evade such "damnable" and "blasphemous" doctrines as lay concealed behind our fair advertisements.

Having printed his "warning," the Hagerstown Mail was fair enough to print my reply, wherein I said: "For one professing to possess the 'charity' that 'thinketh no evil,' Reverend Walton's advance criticism of a lecture he never yet heard, seemed 'rather previous.' The 'charity' that lacks the intellectual hospitality to 'hear the other side' condemns itself."

Mr. Remsburg's musical delivery, flowing eloquence, and scholarly address so entranced his intelligent hearers as to make it what our advertisements promised—truly "an intellectual treat." That his telling points struck the ignorant and superstitious with consternation was evident from the hasty retreat they several times beat from the hall, just after his reaching a climax. But their places were quickly taken by others, eager to hear what they could not stand. Altogether it was a grand success. Three of the daily papers gave comparatively good reports of the lecture—the fourth and poorest ignoring us entirely. In a three-quarter-column report, the Herald and Torch said "the audience was made up of quite respectable people," and that "the lecturer is a good-looking man," and rehearsed a number of the points made by the speaker.

Under double-column headlines, the Mail reported the lecture of Rev. Dr. Thomas Marshall, field secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, and that of Mr. J. E. Remsburg in adjoining columns, heading it, "Two Lectures of Widely Different Kinds." It said he "lectured before a large crowd," and "if all the people in there believe as he does, there is room for a lot of church missionary work here." It then gave an excellent three-quarter-column report of what he said, pithily selecting his most telling points.

With the prestige of having drawn such a large and intelligent audience, given them such an intellectual treat, and received such recognition by the press, the noble cause of Freethought has, in Hagerstown, taken a giant stride forward. For, as our handbills stated, this was "the first genuine Freethought lecture here in forty years." After the lecture quite a number of persons gave Mr. Remsburg orders for THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Freethought literature.

To have a successful lecture we would say, Decide on it sufficiently early to have plenty of time for advertising it, collect all subscriptions before the time of the lecture, hire a hall, advertise thoroughly—especially by handbills—and Mr. Remsburg will do the rest.

D. WEBSTER GROH.

Remorse.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A TALE OF A HALO."

Once upon a midnight dreary,
As I pondered, weak and weary,
On the pattern of the pinions
That my sinful soul should wear,
Felt I then a nervous shrinking,
All my sense within me sinking,
And next moment I was blinking
In the Portal's blinding glare;
And I knew by angel voices
That came floating on the air,
I had climbed the golden stair.

But a quaking fear came o'er me,
As I saw, direct before me,
Like a vision of Nemesis,
One I'd written of before.
Not a moment stopped or stayed he,
But in my direction made he,
And my crouching figure laid he,
With a blow, upon the floor.
Then he sat himself upon me,
As I lay upon the floor,
Just without the shining door.

'Twas the glorified St. Peter,
And he spake: "Ye wretched creature,
Ye composed in vilest meter,
And ye printed o'er and o'er,
That unholy, lying story
Of the saints and hosts of glory,
Where ye told of combats gory
On this peaceful, shining shore;
Where ye said I robbed a soldier
Of his monetary store,
In the martyr days of yore."

And with every word came tapping,
Oft increased to fiercest rapping,
Peter's key upon my forehead,
Till my very brain was sore.
And continued thus the porter:
"O young man, ye shouldn't order!
Ye are truly a distorter
Of the truth, which I deplore.
For your fate is long decided;
Ye shall roast forevermore
Where the devils howl and roar.

"Cease this awful tapping! Cease it!
Let me up, St. Peter! Cheese it!"
Loud I howled in helpless horror;
"Cease this torture, I implore!"
Yet but faster came the horrid
Rain of blows upon my forehead
Till I doubted that my torrid
Fate could hold, of anguish, more,
And commingling with the pleadings
That my frenzied accents bore,
Came this answer: "Nevermore."

Did ye plan to pass this portal?
Did ye hope for life immortal?
Did ye think I had forgotten
All ye said of me before?
Never hope, unhappy liar,
To escape the brimstone fire.
Ye shall suffer torments dire
From the devils, evermore;
Ye shall broil, and fry, and sizzle
On that terror-haunted shore
And be heard from "nevermore."

Then he ceased his harsh upbraiding
And my aching figure, aiding
To assume an upright posture,
Quickly seized me by the hair,
And in swift contortions, curled me,
As around his head he whirled me,
Then with frightful speed he hurled me
Down the shining Golden Stair.
And a host of howling devils
Who were waiting for me there,
Swiftly bore me through the air.

And the loud, triumphant shrieking,
And the harsh, discordant squeaking
Of the black and horny pinions
Filled my ears with horrid roar.
Soon I heard the frightful booming;
Soon I saw the sulph'rous spuming
And with desperation, fuming,
I awoke, upon the floor,
With my heels upon the table
And my head upon the floor,
'Twas a dream and nothing more.

But St. Peter, never flitting,
On my stomach still is sitting,
In these nightly visitations,
As I writhe upon the floor.
And his eyes have all the seeming
Of a demon that is dreaming,
And I fear their awful gleaming,
Through my reason yet will bore.
For my soul from out the horror
Of these dreams upon the floor
Shall be lifted, nevermore.

THE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

So said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Books by SALADIN.

(W. STEWART ROSS),

Editor of the London Agnostic Journal

GOD AND HIS BOOK.

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold lettered, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

CHRISTIANITY and the SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and Science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. Paper, 10c.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. Paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN AND REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same or more interest than Helen Gardner's story 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" Paper, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies.	1.00
Fifty copies.	4.50
One hundred copies.	8.00

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

The Bible and Evolution.

By Arthur B. Moss.

Of this valuable book the London "Free-thinker" says: "It is by far the best production of Mr. Moss's pen, and we heartily recommend it as an excellent text-book of the subject. The manner is good, and the style is bright. The reader is carried along on an easy-flowing stream of science, history, ethics, and common-sense."

RELIGION AND THE BIBLE. By F. D. Cummings.

A common-sense examination of the Bible, by a common-sense man. He takes the Bible as it is in the English version, and by comparison of different books and passages demonstrates the inconsistencies and contradictions therein. At the same time he seems to be willing to accept all that appears to be true and good in it. He shows that the religious cult of Moses was at least largely derived from the older cult of the Egyptians, and displays the similarity of many great points in the Christian system to the older systems of India. His idea is that "the Bible is the emanation from the minds of many men, containing statements true and statements false; ideas great and ideas small; sayings wise and sayings foolish; a mixture of fact and fiction, and the philosophy and conceptions of many ancient minds: Hebrews, Persians, and Egyptians."

THE BETTER WORLD. By E. B. Southwick, M.D.

This is not, as one might suppose from its title, a book relating to another and future world of existence beyond this mortal life; but the author has followed the plan of other authors of Utopias, of imagining a world and people, in describing whom he sets forth his own notions of a more perfect state and condition than he finds on earth to-day. More, Bellamy, and others have been his forerunners in the same highways and byways of an ideal human social state wherein the evils of the present conditions should be avoided and the best good and happiness of all should be secured. Such writings are valuable, as serving to assist toiling humanity to seek to realize the better ideals of the human mind in this present life and world. Readers will find the book very interesting.—Progressive Thinker.

A TALE OF A HALO. By Morgan A. Robertson. Paper, 50 cents. The Truth Seeker Company, New York.

This story is told in rhyming verse and pictorials by A. Carey K. Jurist who evidently must have been on very familiar terms with St. Peter and other higher realm celebrities.

RELIGION AND THE BIBLE. By F. D. Cummings. Paper, 50 cents. The Truth Seeker Company, New York.

This book is a conservative inquiry into the relation of the Bible to religion. It is more modern in tone than customary in similar works, if anything leading to a broader conception and higher reverence for the gospel.—Omaha Bee.

[The "broader conception" is all right, but if we had supposed that the reading of the book would lead to "a higher reverence" for the Bible we do not think we should have published it. We do not believe that reverence for a particular book is a sign of mental health, especially reverence for as faulty a work as the Bible. We want people to get a solid grasp on the facts in connection with the origin, history, and teachings of the Bible, and we opine that Mr. Cummings's little book will help give them that grasp.—Ed. T. S.]

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, published by the Truth Seeker Publishing Company, New York city, for 1895 has been received. This is the ninth of the series, and fully maintains the high standard of excellence which characterized the preceding numbers. In addition to the usual calendar, the 127 large pages present the following interesting articles: "Freethought in the United States," a carefully prepared review of the progress made in the past four years, by the Editor; "The Old and the New," a contribution by Col. R. G. Ingersoll, which everybody will want to read; "What the Church Has Not Done for Woman," by Matilda Joselyn Gage. We especially refer to this article to the consideration of the ladies of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, who are beginning to yearn for those rights which were the theme of Mrs. Gage and her few associates half a century ago, when every orthodox church was closed against them and the pulpits of the land echoed with the bitterest denunciations of these brave and talented women. "Progress of Science," by Jas. B. Alexander is another able paper. "What Are Women Here For?" by Helen H. Gardener, every woman ought to read. Helen Gardener is one of the foremost lady writers of this country, and this lecture on woman's rights condenses in a few pages enough arguments to knock a man off his pins in five minutes, if he attempts the role of a St. Paul with the aspiring women of today. John Peck furnishes a well written article entitled, "A Queer God and his Queer Book." "What We Stand For" is a digest of a lecture delivered by Henry Rowley before the Brooklyn Philosophical Association. Those who want to know what a Freethinker seeks to accomplish should read this. Then we have "Freethought in the Church and in the Higher Literature" by A. H. Hamilton; "Education for Children," by that popular author, Susan H. Wixon; "Secular Sunday-schools," by Katie Kehm Smith; and an amusing story, by that incomparable wit, George E. Macdonald, entitled, "The One-Horned Ox." This is not the entire contents, but enough to show the scope of the ANNUAL, which is neatly bound in a handsome cover. Price, 25 cents.—Denison (Tex.) Gazetteer.

A TALE OF A HALO
Will afford many hearty laughs to every reader. It is a poem by Morgan A. Robertson, illustrated by A. Cary K. Jurist, and relates the incidents attending a visit of Beelzebub to heaven, sent there by Satan to "make things lively" for a time. Many of the ideas are very amusing, and are told with considerable poetical ability. The book is one of the latest additions to the Truth Seeker Library, and is printed on fine heavy paper, in square 16mo, 70 pages, 50 cents.—Secular Thought.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

Not for Parsons.

WILLIS: "Deacon Sniffles says he votes as he prays." Wallace: "Very likely; they say he prays three times a day, and I've heard it intimated that he votes fully as often."—Life.

SHE: "Why didn't you come to our church bazar?" He: "Well, I'm strictly business. I buy in the lowest market." She: "What, you never carry religion into your business?" He: "No. I always give change."—Life.

MOTHER: "What's the matter, Sammy?" Sammy: "Why pop's in the next room praying for rain, and to-morrow's our Sunday-school picnic." Mother: "Oh, well, stop crying; it won't make any difference—oh, shut up, and go out and play."

"Huh," exclaimed the first little girl, after she heard the story of the fall of man, "the serpent couldn't tempt me with an apple. I don't like apples." "But," argued the second girl, "s'pose somebody'd told you not to eat apples?"—Inquirer.

AN exchange tells it this way: "The priest saves the man who helps support him, and damns the man who does not. The doctrine of the church is, 'God will damn the man who does not pay the priest.'" The editor of that sheet is evidently beyond the saving grace of the holy ghost.—Freethinker.

INVENTOR: "I've hit a money-making thing at last. The preachers will go crazy over it, and it will sell like hot cakes. It's a church contribution box." Friend: "What good is that?" Inventor: "It's a triumph. The coins fall through slots of different sizes, and all dollars, halves, quarters, and dimes on velvet; but the nickels and pennies drop on a Chinese gong."—N. Y. Weekly.

HERE is a curious advertisement, copied by the Sporting Magazine from an English country paper: "Wanted—For a sober family, a man of light weight, who fears the Lord, and can drive a pair of horses. He must occasionally wait at table, join in household prayer, look after the horses, and read a chapter in the Bible. He must, God willing, rise at 7 in the morning, and obey his master and mistress in all lawful commands; if he can dress hair, sing psalms and play at cribbage, the more agreeable. N.B.—He must not be familiar with the maid-servants, lest the flesh should rebel against the spirit, and he should be induced to walk in the thorny paths of the wicked. Wages, fifteen guineas a year."

NEARLY all the principal characters in the Old Testament have been accredited with coats-of-arms. These are, as a rule, highly appropriate, except in the case of Joseph's heraldic coat, which was merely black, tintured with white—"chequy sable and argent"—whereas something after the pattern of Adam's second coat would surely have been more in keeping with the youthful Joseph's favorite attire. Gideon bore arms, sable, a fleece argent, as chief azure gutte d'eau; David, a harp or in a field argent; and Samson, gules, a lion couchant or, within an orle argent, semee of bees sable. Armorial ensigns are supposed to have received divine sanction, for God, when prescribing unto Moses the form of conducting the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness, expressly commanded the use of armorial signs, saying, "The children of Israel shall pitch their tents every man by his own camp, and every man by his own standard."—Cornhill Magazine.

THE hands of the clock pointed to 3:45, and school would not be dismissed until 4. So the school-ma'am, who was a strict moralist, thought she would give the young ideas a short lecture on goodness and morality. After explaining to the little folks the various grades of punishment for infractions on the law, she resolved to ask a few questions to ascertain if her words had been comprehended.

"Now children," she said, "I've told you what becomes of bad men, and how good men get bad by loitering about saloons and associating with bad men. Now let me see how many of you have profited by my talk. I wish some of you to tell me where your papas go."

Nobody answered. It was plain the school-ma'am was in too deep water for the youngsters. She seemed to think so, too, so she said:

"I'll make that a little easier. Tell me where your papas don't want to go to." (Expecting such answers as prison, penitentiary, and jail.) There was a painful wait, but finally a little fellow in one of the rear seats slowly raised his hand. "Ah, there's one boy that can answer that question. Tell us, Tommy, where your papa doesn't want to go."

"To church," replied Tommy. "He says so every Sunday morning." Whereupon school was dismissed.—Truth.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE
Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

GREATNESS once and forever has done with opinion.—Walt Whitman.

WHAT has ecclesiasticism to do with moral laws? It puts them all aside and puts its own creed and catechism in their place.—J. A. Froude.

SOME men work directly in freedom's interest. Other men work for freedom by opposing it. The ebb and flow adjusts all values.—Horace L. Traubel.

HEROISM works in contradiction to the voice of mankind, and in contradiction, for a time, to the voice of the great and good.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

ANY human being, however humble or liable to error, may render an essential service to society by making, through a whole lifetime, a steady, uncompromising, dispassionate declaration of his convictions as they are matured.—Harriet Martineau.

TAKE your statute books, and you will find ten, yea, twenty, laws to coerce the people, to strip them, to impoverish them; where you will find one to protect or help them. And the people like it. They smack their lips, shut their eyes, and say, "That's good! Give me some more!"—Ignatius Donnelly.

It has often and confidently been asserted that man's origin can never be known; but ignorance more frequently begets confidence than does knowledge; it is those who know little, and not those who know much, who so positively assert that this or that problem will never be solved by science.—Charles Darwin.

JUST as bodily development and structure and function, furnish subject-matter for biological science, though the events set forth by the biographer go beyond its range; so social growth, and the rise of structures and functions accompanying it, furnish subject-matter for a Science of Society, though the facts with which historians fill their pages mostly yield no material for science.—Herbert Spencer.

THE man who, on account of another's religious views, opposes him in politics, is strangely out of touch with the spirit and genius of American institutions. He is a bigot, and, no matter by what manner of title he may be known, is an enemy of free institutions, free speech, and free government. Beware of such a man. Take no counsel from him. Whatever, and however exalted, may be his motives, his lack of vision, his fanatical instincts, make him your enemy and the enemy of mankind.—Progressive Age.

THOSE who believe that science can go on making progress, and spreading itself more and more without impeding the life and vigor of religion, are making a great mistake. Physics and metaphysics are the natural enemies of religion, and therefore she is the enemy of those sciences, always trying to suppress them, as they are ever trying to undermine her. It is ridiculous to talk of peace and concord between them; it is a bellum ad internecionem. Religions are children of ignorance, and do not long survive their mother.—Schopenhauer.

THE moral law is not a collection of petty rules, but a philosophy of the ends of life. The happiness of humanity is its end, and if too much self-sacrifice endangers that, we shall come to condemn self-sacrifice and extol self-interest. Morality is not "Nature's trick" to delude us into altruism. Rather is supernaturalism "Nature's trick"—the attempt of man before he became scientific to justify the morality within him. Supernatural sanctions have not proved adequate. The driving force in man is nothing but the love of righteousness, and that will be the eternal motif.—Stanton Coit.

It is hard for a poet to use his inspiration in the interest of narrowness and timidity. When the dainty skill of Aldrich would sing plaintively instead of joyfully of the unguarded gates of America, he loses his insight, and when he would have America take warning from trampled Rome into which Goth and Vandal thronged, leaving the temples of the Cæsars for "the lean wolf unmolested," he forgets that the Goth and Vandal made better use of Europe than did the Cæsars. It was the survival of the fittest. So far as Rome decayed, it was for the upbuilding of Paris, Berlin, London. It may be so here. Let them come. If the Saxon pluck and Celtic fire, fused in Yankee grit and ingenuity, are not equal to the situation and cannot utilize the splendid raw material offered us, the fate of the Cæsars is our merit. We shall go down, that better forces may take our place.—Unity.

News of the Week.

By the burning of a laundry in London eight persons lost their lives.

THE New York Central and Hudson River Railroad has abolished all stop-over privileges on its tickets.

THE Gerry society in this city recently imprisoned a mother for "abducting" her daughter, a girl in her teens.

JOSEPH BARONDESS was re-elected president of the Cloakmakers' Union, although vigorously opposed by the Socialists.

THERE were earthquake shocks in the City of Mexico and in Rome on December 31st. In South Hungary also recently.

At the fire in the Delevan House at Albany fifteen lives were lost, nearly all of those burned being employees of the hotel.

THE Susquehanna river is to be utilized to generate electricity for the cities of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Wilmington.

TWENTY-SEVEN Anarchists who were imprisoned at Barcelona during the anti-dynamite campaign have lately been released.

THE priests who have been fighting Bishop Bonacum of the Lincoln, Nebraska, diocese, have at last surrendered and moved into other dioceses.

THE report from the county elections in Georgia last week is that heavy Democratic gains and corresponding Populist losses are apparent.

It is reported that the Anneke Jans heirs are about to make one more attempt to secure the property now held by the Trinity Church Corporation.

OWING largely, it is said, to the new law forbidding the employment of aliens in city or state work, the streets of New York are in the worst possible condition.

GREAT BRITAIN assures the United States that she claims no right of sovereignty over the Mosquito territory, but acknowledges the sovereignty of Nicaragua.

THE Philadelphia grand jury indicted Charles W. Mowbray, the Revolutionary Communist, whose arrest for a speech made in that city was chronicled last week.

In this city, in one block bounded by Avenues B and C, Second and Third streets, there are 3,532 people, and in seven squares in the tenement district there is a total of 22,970.

SENATOR HILL visited President Cleveland at the White House on January 3d and dined there, the first time he has called for thirteen months. It has set all the politicians to talking.

It is reported that Tahsin Pasha, who commanded the military operations in the Sassoun district of Armenian Turkey, where the outrages were committed, has been assassinated by an Armenian who afterward committed suicide.

THE Judicial Committee of the British Privy Council reverses the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in the Manitoba school case, and gives the Dominion government power to grant relief to the Catholics in the matter of separate schools.

THE New York Civil Service Commission has, after investigation, decided to strike the names of ten policemen from the eligible list because they procured their places by fraud, and the report of the investigation was forwarded to the Police Board.

OUR exports of manufactured goods for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, amounted to $158,023,118, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, to $183,910,547. There might fairly be added to the government's list such products as wheat flour ($75,000,000), refined oils ($42,000,000), etc.

THE inhabitants of this country one or both of whose parents were born in foreign lands equal 33 per cent of the total population. But they are distributed very unevenly. For instance, North Carolina has only seven-tenths of one per cent, while North Dakota has 77.98 per cent. The percentage does not reach 3 per cent in Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, or Alabama. Minnesota has 78.42 per cent. The South is emphatically the "nativ American" stronghold, and, by a curious coincidence, Free thought is weaker there than in any other part of the country.

THE destitution in Newfoundland has tended to produce riotous demonstrations in St. John's and other places. On December 31st two hundred mariners from the warship Tourmaline paraded the streets of St. John's in heavy marching order

YAHWEH REBUKETH SATAN.

Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?—Zech. iii, 2, 3.

To the Senate and Assembly of the Legislature of the State of New York:

We citizens of the State of New York, respectfully request you to repeal the Sunday law of this State. We ask this because,

First, Sunday being a period of time of precisely the same nature as Saturday or Monday, there is no natural reason for its being elevated above or depressed below the other days of the week.

Second, Said Sunday law is, in the best possible view of it, useless; it is wholly inoperative as a conservator of the rights of any inhabitant of the State.

Third, It is invasive of the equal rights of the citizens of the State, an impertinent meddling with their private affairs, and its effect is to disturb their peace and rob them of their earnings.

Fourth, In making or amending our laws, common sense and experience should be the guides, instead of sentiment—religious or otherwise. Experience has demonstrated that Sunday laws are not observed by the people, and common sense teaches that, in the nature of things, they never will be, for it cannot be wrong to do on one day what it is right to do on another. The people, feeling this and knowing this, will not be governed by the dead churchmen who made these laws, which are anachronistic and have been perpetuated by hypocrisy. Here we will call your attention to the words of Martin Luther, a churchman we are willing to put against the ecclesiastics of to-day: "As regards the Sabbath, or Sunday, there is no necessity of keeping it. . . . If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake—if anywhere anyone sets up its observance upon a Jewish foundation—then I order you to work on it, to dance on it, to ride on it, to feast on it—to do anything that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit of liberty."

Fifth, Sunday laws are vicious, for they are used as instruments of blackmail and of cruel oppression by the police of the cities, as the revelations of the Lexow Committee abundantly show. They produce more crime than they could possibly prevent, for blackmail is more immoral than drinking.

Sixth, All such laws are essentially religious in their intent and effect and as such they are opposed to the spirit of our institutions, which do not favor the union of church and state. The Sunday law of the State of New York is no exception to the rule, and it should be immediately repealed in the interest of religious liberty, if for no other reason. This law is a survival from the time when there was a state church and the civil power enforced the Sunday law of the state church, just as it enforced that church's blasphemy and heresy statutes. But where there is no state church the state has nothing to do with the enforcement of the domestic rules of any church or those of Christianity in its entirety.

For these and other reasons we ask the entire repeal of the Sunday laws rather than a patching which shall discriminate against one business and foster another. We ask that the liquor trade be subject to the same rules on Sunday that it is on other days, and the same with all other kinds of business. It is not proper for the state to legislate in the interests of any legitimate trade as against any other legitimate trade, and we ask your careful attention to this admitted fact and particularly ask you to bear in mind the also admitted fact that Sunday laws are a fruitful source and an adequate means of blackmail.

with Gatling and field guns. The people believe that they have been swindled by a combination of speculators who are favored by the government. The government is accused of discriminating between the two banks, one the poor man's and the other the rich man's, in guaranteeing their notes.

GOVERNOR MITCHELL, of Florida, has revoked the requisition he granted for the extradition of Henry M. Flagler of the Standard Oil Company, wanted in Texas for alleged violation of the anti-trust law of that state. The revocation is based on the fact that Mr. Flagler is not a fugitive from justice from Texas.

THE Belgian government has closed the port of Antwerp against American meat and live stock; Spain has imposed a practically prohibitory duty on flour; France refuses to consider the bids of American canned goods firms for her army supplies; Germany and Denmark have shut out our meat products, and Sweden has heavily increased the duty on corn and wheat. Belgium alleges that pleuro-pneumonia prevails in the United States, but it is generally understood that the action taken against American goods by European governments is partly in retaliation for our duty on beet sugar and partly for the purpose of securing a better home market for their own produce. Germany and Austria-Hungary have formally protested against our 1-10 per cent duty on sugar, as being in violation of treaty obligations.

WHAT THE FANATICS MAY TRY TO DO NEXT.

Lo! that torrent flowing free, has become a mighty sea; deeper wider yet to be — still it grows.
All their venom'd filth can't stain it, nor their little sponges drain it, neither dams nor dams restrain it — on it goes.
Though they smite it with their rod, thinking thus to pass dry-shod though they curse it by their god — yet it flows!
Let the horns of bigots blow, and fools their hatred show. Still that sparkling tide will flow — past its foes.

Paine and Franklin.

We shall print in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 26, 1895, an article by W. H. BURR on
"THE SECRET THRIFT OF THOMAS PAINE."

This Mr. Burr regards as a very important contribution to the literature on Paine, as being something new for the biographers to consider on the approaching Paine Anniversary.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 2 we shall have a long article by JOHN E. REMSBURG on
"BENJAMIN FRANKLIN: WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?"

Everyone who has read Mr. Remsburg's works knows the thoroughness with which he will deal with this subject, and also knows that when he has read this paper he will know more about Franklin than the average man does at present.

Single copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 7 cents. In quantities of five and over, 5 cents each. Now is the time to subscribe.

As to Who Is Damned.

"Eloquent sermons were preached, the bells rang out the first glad old welcome, and the churches were filled with the honest, devoted Christian people all day yesterday, notwithstanding the tirade of the eloquent Ingersoll against the Bible the night before."—Buffalo Times.

"It was ever thus even from the days of that other anti-Christian sneerer, Julian, the apostate. And it will so continue when all the little Ingersollian tribe shall be dead and damned."—Catholic Union and Times.

Don't be too sure about the damnation, Father Cronin; perhaps your God is not so intolerant of differences of opinion as you are pleased to think he is. Possibly he is an admirer of independent people; he was something of a "reformer" himself in his younger days, as you must admit when you recall the fact that he set up in business long after several of the other gods did, and so must have been regarded by the priests of those other gods as an interloper and a rebel. He must have possessed a certain amount of originality and courage to strike out in that way for himself. He may not hate men who think quite so fiercely as you imagine he does. As to Julian, it is true that he is dead, but he would have been dead just the same if he had been the most devoted of Christians, while as to his being damned—except by a superstitious church—that is all a matter of guess-work with you. He lives in history and in fame, and it is certain that a large number of the "Ingersollian tribe" will share his earthly glory in centuries to come. There does not seem to be anything miraculous in the survival among the millions of the belief in Christianity; evolution is a slow and painful process; religions thousands of years older than that dominant in this country are yet alive and vigorous; Christianity is a minority faith, and will be a minority faith after every present acceptor of it is dead, if not damned. While it is true that Christianity is yet much more powerful than it should be, it is comforting to reflect that it has lost a great deal of prestige and authority since the days when it silenced Galileo and burned Bruno. That THE TRUTH SEEKER can be published and that Colonel Ingersoll can talk to the immense audiences that greet him is pretty good proof that Christianity has failed to keep the world in the depths of ignorance and the shadows of fear in which it was plunged when Catholicism's chief priest gave the law to the monarchs of Europe.

For Repeal of New York's Sunday Laws.

The legislature of this state is now in session, and the hour is come when we must go to work in earnest for the repeal of the odious Sunday laws which have too long disgraced the statute books of a great commonwealth. No doubt many of our New York readers have cut the petition heading from THE TRUTH SEEKER, and have already procured long lists of names of those who do not want to be ruled by the church or have their private affairs spied into by meddling preachers and their agents. It will be very easy to get hundreds of thousands of signatures to that petition. All who want extra blanks should at once notify us, and we will forward them. Do not wait for some one else in your neighborhood to do the work. Take right hold yourself. It is no task whatever to answer objections. The petition heading is itself an unanswerable argument.

This is a fight in self-defense. The Sunday laws, tyrannous enough in themselves, are but the beginning. A Revival of Puritanism is sweeping over the land—and Puritanism is despotism. If it succeeds it will suppress free speech; it will not permit us to discuss the Sunday question, to agitate for the repeal of Sunday laws. At the recent Sabbatarian convention in Greensburg, Pa., Rev. Dr. McAllister, editor of the Christian Statesman, was asked if Seventh-Day Adventists should be permitted to teach their doctrines. He answered: "No; not if they are opposed to Christian laws. We must not permit any man on the plea of conscience to put himself in antagonism to the laws of the government." Subsequently he said: "We must get our civil officers to hunt down the violators of Sunday laws where there is a suspicion." Another speaker said: "To try to get Sunday laws obliterated from our statute books is treason." How do you, as free Americans, like this? Do you want it to go any farther?

Here is what one of our New York Liberals has to say about the matter now in hand:

"I am glad to see petitions are to be sent to our legislature asking it to abolish all Sunday laws. It ought to have been done years ago. Such laws should never have been enacted. Every member of the legislature should be furnished with the reasons why Sunday laws, unjust taxation laws, and many other privileges granted to religious organizations—privileges that benefit them at the expense of others—should be swept away. And another thing is that many legislators will not vote their sentiments for fear they will offend their religious constituents and thereby lose their political support in future elections. Now I think that any member of the legislature who votes for the continuance of Sunday laws, or who favors their continuance, or fails to vote when his name is called, should be listed by all Liberal people as unworthy the support of Freethinkers if he is ever again a candidate for any public office."

The suggestion of our friend, Carlton Rice, is worthy of much more than a passing thought. At present the thing to be done is to give the members of the legislature a chance to put themselves on record on this issue. To this end we shall provide them with anti-Sabbatarian literature and roll in upon them the petitions that come to THE TRUTH SEEKER office. All that we can do we will do to help on the repeal movement, and the more generously Freethinkers hold up our hands the more we can accomplish. Since our last acknowledgment we have received fifty cents from H. Merrick, one dollar from Stephen Brewer, and ten dollars from Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr. These sums, added to those previously received, will send a good many pamphlets to the legislators and to the newspapers, but not a tithe that should be put into missionary service. Then we should also be in a position to send a man to Albany to present our facts and arguments to the proper committee. To do this we must have a fund out of which to pay his expenses. The struggle is one for the rights of all the people; hence all are interested, and they cannot feel that it is an imposition to ask them to help provide the sinews of war, if they recognize the iniquity of the laws against which we are protesting and the graver dangers that threaten.

Undoubtedly it would be well for all of our readers to send their petitions directly to the assemblymen and senators representing their own districts. In many cases their influence would unquestionably be greater if so brought to the immediate attention of the individual lawmaker. We shall be glad if all who send petitions to Albany will notify us of the fact, and tell us how many names they secured. Repeal the Sunday laws.

Zion's Herald does not look with favor on the present movement for individual communion cups in lieu of the time-honored common cup. It says that the change would emphasize the "too prevalent tendency toward cleavage on personal or class lines"; it would destroy the idea of Christian brotherhood, and erect caste barriers. This is a quarrel within the church, but we cannot forbear saying that the objections of Zion's Herald are absurd to a degree. If it is scientifically assured that the common cup is a possible source of contagion, why would there be an establishment of caste distinctions in providing individual cups? Cannot one guard himself against disease without making an attack on the brotherhood of man? Would the editor of the Boston paper be willing to use at the dinner table the dishes and knives and forks just used by a person suffering with an infectious disease? And does he think that his refusal to do so would be a stab at the "Christian brotherhood" of the human race? Is it not possible to be religious without being at the same time ridiculous?

Great Reductions in Standard Freethought Works.

The popularity of our missionary scheme, by which Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is being scattered broadcast by the thousands, has induced us to lower the price of his other works, with the hope that they too will have a wider reading. From this date the prices of Paine's books will be as follows:

AGE OF REASON. Paper, 25 cents. Eight copies sent to as many different addresses for $1. Cloth, 50 cents.

EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Paper, 15 cents.

COMMON SENSE. The argument that did more than any other to convince the Revolutionary leaders of the necessity of the separation of this country from Great Britain. Paper, 15 cents.

THE CRISIS. Paine's great Revolutionary writings. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Answer to Burke's attack on the French Revolution. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PAINE'S GREAT WORKS IN ONE VOLUME. 8vo., 800 pp., cloth, $3, leather $4, morocco, gilt edges, $4.50. This book and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $5.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. One volume containing Common Sense, Crisis, and Rights of Man. Cloth, $1.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. One volume containing Age of Reason, Examination of the Prophecies, Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff, Essay on Dreams, Letters, etc. With Life of Paine and steel portrait. Cloth, $1.

We hope all our readers will do their best to scatter these splendid works all over the country.

The Perils of One-Idealism.

Hobby-riding is a pleasant and healthful exercise if not indulged in to excess, but that is a risk the hobby-rider always runs; he doesn't know when to dismount. He sticks to the saddle so continuously that he and his mount become one, as it were, a sort of modern centaur, and he is thus led to actually believe that if he should attempt to get off for a moment it would be the death of him, and it might also stop all the machinery of the universe. This was the unhappy and unsteady state of mind our friend, the editor of the New York People, was in when he penned this remarkable paragraph:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER has long been tangled in the consequences of confounding cause and effect. It sees wrong on earth, and it sees priestcraft. Whereupon it concludes that priestcraft is the cause of the existing wrong, instead of, as is really the case, priestcraft being a result of wrongful conditions. If THE TRUTH SEEKER proceeded upon facts, it would know that priestcraft, together with all that thereby hangs, is but a reflex of economic conditions, and, consequently, that, in order to abolish priestcraft, the thing to do is to endeavor to alter wrongful economic conditions, instead of tugging at the clergy."

THE TRUTH SEEKER has never said or thought that priestcraft is the cause of "the existing wrong" on earth. It has merely maintained that it is the cause of a great part of it. Neither does it believe that wrongful economic conditions are the causes of priestcraft. No doubt those conditions contribute to the perpetuation of priestcraft, but he who asserts that they are the sole source thereof does not understand the relation that man's fear of the Unknown bears to the institutional church. It is not poverty that makes men the slaves of the priest. The late Alexander of Russia was as abject a devotee as the most destitute moujik in the empire. The mere possession of wealth is not a guarantee of intelligence, nor do the miseries of the poor suffice to wean them from the delusion that they are in the care of a good and merciful providence. Education and evolution are the emancipators, and in so far as the improvement of economic conditions helps to truly educate the people, to that extent it is true that industrial reform will weaken the power of the priesthood. But it is equally true that so long as men believe that this world is only a preparatory school for an eternal life in another world, and that in that other world they will be compensated for the sufferings they endure in this, there is precious little chance to get any rational reform work out of them in the here and now. If the People would stop theorizing long enough to acquaint itself with some of the facts of American life it would not make such a spectacle of itself so frequently. It should know that the stronghold of the minister is and has been the rural districts of the country, and that it is the vote of the farmers that he wields as a club to strike down the religious and social liberties of all the people. This is the general truth; of course there are exceptions, but they are exceptions. Yet the farmers are the very ones who, until very recently, were the most independent class of American citizens; they did not feel under any obligation to any "boss," financial or factory, and the only man whom they respected above his just deserts as a fellow-being was the "minister of God." He alone was clothed in their eyes with an extra-human sanctity. No, something more is needed than economic independence to break the power of the church. The freedom of man will never come until men have learned to think and act for themselves, both in concerns religious and in concerns industrial. One people may be poor and yet be free, and another may be rich and still be the slaves of the priest.

The Christian Advocate of Nashville remarks that "a merely naturalistic religion is not worth preserving. The ethical elements of our creed draw their life and power from association with the idea of a personal God." If this is so, how do you account for the indisputable fact that in Christian countries the safeguards of the liberty and life of man were weakest when faith in that personal God was strongest?

Some of the special Sunday papers of London have enormous circulations. The People goes to 300,000 subscribers and purchasers; Reynolds's issues 360,000 copies, and Lloyd's 710,000. There are nine or ten of these special Sunday papers, according to William Clarke, who writes about them in the New England Magazine. We doubt if our Sunday worshipers would prefer these papers to the Sunday issues of the American dailies.

Thomas S. Charity, of New Haven, O., was a soldier in the Civil conflict, and consequently he is not very young at the present time. While he receives but a small pension, he has a family dependent on him and can do no work, as he has heart disease. He is a Freethinker and delights to read the Liberal papers, but is wholly unable to subscribe for them. Can any of our readers help him in this direction? He would greatly appreciate the kindness of those who will send him their papers, after reading, if they do not desire to preserve them. Or perhaps some prosperous comrade will settle the matter off-hand by making him a present of a year's subscription.

A New Zealand correspondent of the Christian Commonwealth, after enumerating the demands of the Young Women's Christian Temperance Union of that country—demands at once intolerant, meddling, invasive, persecuting, and potentially disastrous—says: "These planks in the platform of this society show the stuff that our women are made of." Yes, they do, and they foretell the gehenna that New Zealand will be if a party dominated by these women succeed in seizing the reins of power. And a like fate will be ours if the W. C. T. U. of America, with such allies as the National Reform Association and the Sabbath Union, get hold of the government. Miss Willard's Secretary of Amusements will then be the least of our tyrants.

The late Constitutional Convention of this state does not appear to have exactly straightened out the charities tangle which has for so long been a subject of contention. According to the World, the county of New York pays about $2,000,000 annually to charitable institutions for the care of persons who otherwise would be a charge upon the public. "The new constitution forbids such payments to any institution which has not complied with rules established by the state board of charities. But the state board of charities has not established any rules, and it is even a question whether or not there is any state board of charities under the new constitution." And this is the best fruit of the great compromise with the church!

We have just completed the mailing of the new edition of our Catalog to our readers, and to those who have favored us with orders for books. In so large a list it is unavoidable that errors occur, and if any reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER has not received a copy the omission will be cheerfully supplied upon notice to this office. If any one has received two copies we shall esteem it a favor if the extra one be handed to some friend who will be likely to purchase books.

In this case the minister was more honest than the deacons or the deacons more dishonest than the minister, whichever way you choose to put it. We learn by a press dispatch that the Park Congregational church of Springfield, Mass., had an indebtedness of $23,000 which it tried to pay by declaring itself insolvent and getting back its notes at a low per cent of their face value. The pastor, Rev. William H. Dexter, opposed this as dishonest and resigned. However, the comparison is hardly a fair one between the minister and the church members, as it is not probable that any part of the debt would have been paid by Mr. Dexter under any conditions of settlement, and so he was not subjected to the same temptation to scale the debt that his parishioners were.

How much good does the revival do? That is a question that has been asked a great many thousand times. A Toronto clergyman gives us a little light on the subject. Moody was in that city a short time ago and "converted" fifteen hundred persons. The clergymen referred to received the names of fifteen of these for membership in his church, but he reports that upon examining them he finds but two who appear to be at all genuine, and he is at his wits' end to know what to do with the others. Let them go, we suggest, and then when Mr. Mills or some other evangelist stops at Toronto they can easily be "converted" again and thus give Chaplain McCabe or Brother Talmage another opportunity to boast of the "marvelous gains that the church is making."

A Kentucky official has recently tried to effect an extra-statutory union of church and state in that commonwealth. A dispatch from Louisville says that on January 5th a recount of the vote cast for several candidates in that city was taken. Complaint of the methods of counting having been made, Bishop Dudley of the Episcopal church accepted an invitation to assist. The next day it developed that the county clerk had no authority to call in Bishop Dudley, and all of the five or six hundred ballots counted by the clergyman must be thrown out as worthless. This may change the result on the vote for judge of the court of appeals. If it would have the effect of ousting the incompetent clerk the foolish performance would not be without substantial value. The mental processes of an official who could be guilty of such a prostitution of his office would furnish a unique psychological study for Th. Ribot or Alfred Binet.

There are indications that the ministers must hereafter depend more on their own exertions than they have done heretofore. They will soon have to pay full fare on many of the railroads. The Trunk Line Association will on and after March 31 withdraw all privileges accorded to preachers until this time. The New York Central has already done so, the principal reason for the action being that the ministers have abused the privileges granted them, and have loaned their half-fare permits, some going so far as to sell them. This profitable little speculation will no longer be one of the allurements beckoning the ambitious young man into the ministry. Take away the special personal privileges of the ministers, tax the churches, abrogate the Sunday laws, abolish chaplaincies, and banish religious teachings from the common schools, and Christianity will have to fight for its life in a fair field with no favors. This is as it should be, and this is just what separation of church and state means.

We wish our readers would look at the date on their wrappers and see if they do not owe us a renewal. If they find they do, it will be a great favor to us if they will forward it at their earliest convenience, as we need the money. Owing to various causes, more than the usual number are in arrears at present, and this embarrasses us financially, or we wouldn't mention it. We like to keep square with the world, and in order that we may do this it is necessary that our readers keep square with us, for when they let their subscriptions run behind we have to get behind with others. We have no capital to fall back upon, and depend upon getting our dues to give others their due. If our friends who are in arrears will note these facts and act thereupon, it will be, as we have said, a great favor to us, and a favor duly and thankfully appreciated.

A "Purity" committee is endeavoring to close the Sunday theaters of Chicago, being stimulated, probably, by the attempts of their fellow-fossils to shut up the music halls and theaters of Boston on that day. The resulting "purity" will be wholly of a negative kind if the Chicago bigots accomplish their purpose. The young men who have been attending the theaters Sunday nights will be started on the way to worse places, the young women will seek other ways of enjoying themselves, and the employees of the theaters will have to find, if they can, other means of adding to their scanty revenues. Of course many of these employees are women and girls. As the Progressive Thinker says, most of the Sunday night attendants of the theaters are working people who have no time during week-day evenings or are too tired at the day's end to dress for the purpose. But what does the coalition of religious intolerants and artificial morality faddists care for the convenience or rights of the people so only that it has its way and gets an opportunity to try some disastrous experiments?

The fall and winter being more particularly the reading season, and naturally the renewing of subscription season, we hope that our friends will make a little effort to send THE TRUTH SEEKER some new subscribers. A good many of our old ones have had to drop off during the past eighteen months of panic and dullness in the business world, and we need some more to take their places and push on the work. Our friends have never failed us in an emergency, and we again venture to ask them to do something to help by inducing new subscriptions. We have tried to make this easy by the premium offers printed on the second page of this paper, and we think considerable can be done by our friends if they will take the trouble to speak a good word for us to their Liberal acquaintances.

To those who feel like presenting THE TRUTH SEEKER for a short time to some dear friend, our Trial Subscription offer opens the way at a small cost. A great many of the Liberals to whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is first sent this way become permanent subscribers and earnest workers in the cause of mental liberty.

And lastly, after you have induced some acquaintance to subscribe, and sent THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to some friend, send us the names of all the Liberals you know, and we will send them sample copies, and see if they, too, will not subscribe. We need them all.

Rev. Richard Wake, of Topeka, says that to shut the preacher out of the political arena is to give politics over to Satan. By "Satan" he probably means evil. No rational man wants to shut the minister as a citizen out of the field of politics, but as a preacher he meddles with state affairs only to mar. In the halls of legislation he is the parent of evil, and that continually. He brings to the consideration of public affairs a mind devoted to a system of ethics which he claims is directly from the hand of an infinitely wise god, and hence cannot be amended or improved. It is self-evident that a mind so dominated will not examine contemporary problems in the light of present-day facts and knowledge, and will not respect the rights of those who are unable to accept his conclusions, for he speaks not as an ordinary man but as an ambassador of God, as one who has been "called" to interpret the will of the Supreme for the guidance of common mortals. That this is no fanciful Infidel theory is shown by the words of Mr. Wake's which we have cited. He says distinctly that if the preacher is not recognized as a ruling force or influence in politics they are given over to Satan, that is, to evil. This amounts to an assertion that the preacher is the only saving moral force in society, that from the priesthood proceed all the influences that have power to lift man out of and hold him above the mire of vice and crime. This, of course, is the real thought, not so often expressed now as formerly, of the religious leaders. It is this thought that impels the theocrats to strive so desperately to secure the recognition of their creeds in the laws and usages of the country. In order to force their self-claimed superior morality on their fellow-citizens they would, if need be, deny and trample the rights and liberties of all who do not agree with them. This is why they are so anxious to make themselves felt in politics, for as men and teachers they can instruct and help their neighbors better outside than in the political arena. But they—most of them—are far more eager to compel than to instruct.

There are several kinds of "patriots" in this land besides the ordinary patriot who does not need quotation marks or from three to seven capital letters to properly designate him and measure his love of country and freedom. Mr. Remsburg found some of the capitalized "patriots" in the little town of Benton, Pa., the other day. He was announced to lecture there, and it was supposed that the hall of the Patriotic Order of the Sons of America could be secured for the occasion, but the Liberals soon learned that they did not know the "patriots." A member of the "order" wrote to a local paper, in a strain worthy of the witch-hunting days. Here is a characteristic paragraph:

"Kind readers of the Argus and citizens of Benton, such a lecture will never be delivered in this or any other town in a hall owned or controlled by the Patriotic Sons of America. They are true Americans, sworn to be loyal and true to patriotic principles, and true believers in God, his divine work, and acknowledge him as the creator and ruler of the universe. That order will never knowingly permit an Infidel to step inside of its doors on any occasion for such a purpose."

From which it appears that these very patriotic gentlemen do not have sufficient faith in their God to permit one of his children to question the beliefs of others of his creatures. The scribe also says that he does not believe that the Infidels can get either of the hotel halls, for the proprietors are "firm believers in a supreme being" and therefore "will refuse admission to such a lecturer." It would seem to follow that, in the view of this "patriot," belief in God necessarily implies perfect willingness to deny liberty of utterance. The history of the world does not, unfortunately for the reputation of Theism, furnish much evidence to disprove the truth of this assumption. The lover of his country proceeds:

"Citizens of Benton, we cannot afford to permit Infidelity to invade our little town to rail against Christianity. We have enough to contend with already in battling for the cause of God and right."

How weak the Christianity of your "little town" must be if it cannot run the risk entailed by the lecture of a Freethinker. You assume that God is on your side, that you are his earthly champions and defenders and he your heavenly father, and yet you are in mortal fear of a single Infidel. O ye of little faith! Once more the gallant "Christian patriot":

"We have reason to believe that few, if any, of our people would stoop so low as to go and listen to an Infidel railing against God and the Bible. I do not believe there is a father or mother in our town who would wish their children to hear such a lecture, and it is sincerely to be hoped that no such lecture will take place. If it does, it is sincerely hoped none will attend."

Note the attempt to prejudice the pious against such parents as might permit their children to hear Mr. Remsburg speak. How well the writer knows how to invoke the odium theologicum! And what a free and happy nation we shall be when this man and his associated and affiliated "patriots" get a good grip on the tiller of state!

The American Eagle, the American Protective Association paper of Kansas City, Kansas, makes a remarkable statement in a late issue. It seems that the Catholics of Missouri have been trying to get a law to prohibit the reading of the Bible in the common schools. They should have no difficulty in securing the co-operation of the Freethinkers of the state in this laudable undertaking. But the Eagle declares that the movement for secularization "should be vigorously fought." It says that the Catholics have no more right to crowd the Bible out of the schools than the A. P. A's have to crowd it in, and it remarks that "the latter in spirit is contrary to the principles of the American Protective Association." But immediately after this saving expression it significantly adds:

"It is our duty, however, as members of the order to see that there is no legislation effected in opposition to Bible reading; this is a question for communities to settle. When Bible reading in the public school is desired it should be permitted; where it is not desired it should not be forced upon them."

What do you mean when you say that this "is a question for communities to settle"? Do you mean that the majority in a school district or township, if Protestant, may rightfully force the Bible upon the Freethought or Catholic minority, or that the majority, if Freethought or Catholic, may rightfully shut the Bible out of the school despite the protests of the Protestant minority? You have committed yourself to the principle of local option—are you prepared to stand by it honestly and logically to the end? Are you willing that the Catholics, where they are in the majority, shall substitute the Douay for the King James version? Are you willing that they shall introduce nuns as teachers—as they certainly would have a right to do if your principle is sound—and are you willing that they shall employ other Catholic teachers? If so, why did your people make such a fuss in the Gallitzin school case, and why has the Eagle so frequently and intolerantly sworn that the Catholic teachers must get out of the public schools? If the communities may say whether they will have the Bible in their common schools, why may they not say if they will have Catholic or Protestant or Freethought teachers, as the case may be, to the exclusion of all others, or that they will employ teachers regardless of their religious views, as you say they shall not do if the teachers they choose happen to be Catholics? More than this—are you willing that the majority shall, if so disposed, substitute the "Age of Reason" or Ingersoll's "Gods" for the Bible? You must be if you are in earnest in your statement that you favor local option in this matter. But we tell you frankly that we do not believe that you saw to the end of the lane when you turned into it for the purpose of making a flank movement on the Catholics of Missouri. It seems perfectly clear to us that this was only an attempt to dodge the real question at issue, the total separation of church and state as regards primary education. You say that where it is not desired Bible reading "should not be forced upon" the people of the school district. But how are you going to avoid it if you leave the decision of the question to local option? Do you expect that the people of the district will always, or even frequently, be a unit either for or against Bible reading? Are there never to be protesting and outraged minorities? What is the difference, in principle, between the state voting sectarian instruction into the common schools and the township or district voting it into those schools? There is none, and hence the only remedy is the complete secularization of the schools, which involves the banishment of the Bible from the desk of every teacher and pupil. This will place all religions on a plane of equality.

Cause of the Gulf Stream and Similar Ocean Currents.

These are produced by the rotation of the earth, by the land with its peculiar formation, and by the tidal wave with the trade winds. If the earth were a true sphere and evenly covered with a layer of water the tides would follow the moon around the earth like a broad but gentle swell, and not exceed five feet in height directly under the moon, and there would be no gulf stream or any other ocean currents. If there was a narrow belt of land reaching from pole to pole it would act on the principle of a dam and would stop the natural course of the tide, and would raise it from five to twenty-five feet at least. To cause a very high tide, form a bay one hundred miles long and fifty miles wide at the mouth and gradually coming to a point at the extreme end; locate it in the belt of land that reaches from pole to pole, directly under the moon. The tide would rise at the extreme end of the bay one hundred feet at least. This formation gives the tide a very good opportunity to enter the bay and force the water upward. To make this better understood I call your attention to the Bay of Fundy; it is this principle that causes the tide to rise sixty feet or more at the head of that bay—it is the form of the bay that causes the tide to rise so high. Now let us change ends of the bay and see what the effect will be, the location being the same and the mouth of the bay only fifty feet wide and one hundred miles long and fifty miles wide at the extreme end or head; there would be no tide at the extreme end, the opening being so small at the mouth and the demand for the water so large as it made its way up the bay, that it would lose its force long before it reached the head. But every tide would make a fall into the bay, and every ebb tide a fall into the ocean. There would be no possible chance for a sufficient quantity of water to get into this bay to make a tide at the extreme end. The gulf of Mexico is a representation in part of this formation, so much so that the tide is quite small on the west shore. To produce a mill-privilege, therefore, it would only be necessary to cut, at the head of your artificial bay, a channel to the ocean on the other side of the belt of land described as reaching from pole to pole. The ocean would then become your millpond.

The course of the Gulf Stream could be changed by cutting across the isthmus of Panama a channel of sufficient size to admit the passage of the water forming it. The stream would then flow into the Pacific ocean and no longer cross the Atlantic to warm the shores of Europe as it now does. Ocean currents are all equalizers of water. If the water remained equally distributed there would be no ocean currents. The land with its varied formation, together with wind and tide, the two great forces which move or displace the waters of the sea, is continually causing inequalities of water. The moon and sun by attraction draw the water from the poles to the center directly under the moon at the tropics, and it is brought by the tide waves from the east to the west shore, where it is held by moon, sun, and trade winds and forced along the shores north and south. The islands forming the Caribbean sea act on the principle of a breakwater—they change the course of the current and turn it into the gulf of Mexico, which becomes the reservoir or fountain head, and whence the Gulf Stream flows like a river from a lake. It is the equalizer of water as well as heat, and makes its way in the direction of the greatest deficiency of that element.

The warmth of the Gulf Stream is accounted for by the fact that its waters are supplied from the tropics, being brought thither by the tide waves. Acting on the principle of an eddy, water is forced from the poles, and thus the cold currents also are formed.

This theory rests upon the assumption that the water is higher on the east than on the west side of the isthmus of Panama. If the opposite is the fact, then this explanation is incorrect. It must stand or fall when a true survey across the isthmus is made. The continent of America is the great dam in the ocean; it changes the courses of tides and changes tides into currents. Place the continent of America so it will lie east and west, and it will change the ocean currents, destroying some and creating others. If there were no other land on the globe than America, there would be no ocean current except those connected with America. But such not being the case, Africa has her nose in the way, Australia and New Zealand intervene, and Asia is there to stop tides and make ocean currents up the Pacific ocean; so that when we find large bodies of land directly in the path of the tide wave we find ocean currents also. All large oceans have their counter currents or eddies, the water that has been carried west by the tide returning as currents to supply the deficiency, and thus imparting the eddy motion. The tide, with the land and its formation, will produce every circumstance connected with the ocean currents.

Some of the trade winds are caused by the rotary motion of the earth. The sun, constantly warming the air at the surface of the earth, making it lighter by day while the night cools it and makes it heavier, the cool air follows the sun around the earth; and that is the cause of its keeping one direction. Tide on the side of the earth opposite to the moon is the result of reacting force. Every child who has swung by a suspended rope or otherwise has learned the operation of this law, and anyone who moves water in a wide vessel must pay due regard to this principle or he will be likely to let some of the contents slop out.

It will not be wholly foreign to the subject now in hand to explain the phenomena of the earth's rotation. The sun is continually expanding, by heat, the side of the earth turned towards it, thereby making that side lighter. Night meanwhile condenses and makes heavy the opposite side of the globe. This, with its motion around the sun, forces the planet to revolve. If it should turn back upon its course around the sun, its rotation would be in an opposite direction also. JOHN P. WHIPPLE.

Milwaukee, Wis.

[The foregoing article was copyrighted and published by Mr. Whipple in 1873. The report of the United States Coast Survey having verified his theory the treatise acquires additional interest. Speaking of the report he says: "Perhaps the most valuable item is the discovery that the stream changes in velocity daily and monthly and that predictions can be made of the time of these changes. It will be remembered that the tides rise and fall daily, their motion depending chiefly upon the position of the moon in its revolution around the earth, and in the same manner the current varies in velocity daily. During the month another change takes place which follows the moon in its journey north and south of the equator." The following statement is from the Chicago Tribune: "When it was first proposed to open the Panama canal the scheme was strongly opposed on the ground that it would endanger millions of lives. It was asserted that the waters of the Pacific were more than one hundred feet higher than those of the Atlantic, and that if they got headway in the ditch they would drown the country all around on the Atlantic side. It now turns out, after careful survey, that the Atlantic is the higher of the two, and that the difference is about six and a half feet." Mr. Whipple invites criticism and discussion.]

The Sermon on the Mount.

VII.

We now come to about the last part of the Sermon on the Mount that we need consider. I mean the so-called Golden Rule.

Mat. vii, 12, gives it as, "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do you even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets."

Luke vi, 31, gives it as, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to men likewise."

For this maxim of the highest degree of morality we are in no way indebted to Jesus, as it was current all over the world centuries before he lived. He mentions it only on this one occasion, and if he believed it true, why did he not observe it himself? At the marriage feast at Cana, when his mother made a simple remark to him to the effect that they had no wine, he turned on her with, "Woman, what have I to do with thee? (John ii, 1 et seq.) Is that the way he would have had his mother do unto him? In the very next chapter following the one in which he uttered the Golden Rule one of his disciples asked him to let him go and bury his father, and Jesus replied, "Follow me; let the dead bury their dead (Mat. viii, 21, 22). Is that as he would have had others do to him? Surely it is doing as you would be done by to "forgive your enemies." But Jesus tells us at the end of the very chapter that contains the Golden Rule and elsewhere (Mat. xxv, 41) that in the last day he will disown and cast out his enemies without forgiveness, and that the king will say (Mat. xxv, 41), "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." The divine way of doing unto others as ye would be done by is certainly contradictory. When men would not believe in Jesus, or receive his teachings, he assailed them with abusive names and threats. Is that as he would have had others do to him? Take what Professor Huxley calls the Gadarene pig affair, in which Jesus drove a legion of devils into a herd of swine that belonged to some one else, and so they rushed into the sea and were destroyed (Mat. viii, 28 et seq.). Is that as he would have been done by? No wonder the Gadarenes requested him to leave the country.

Confucius, born 551 B.C., taught this maxim before Jesus, and repeatedly called attention to it, thus:

"What I do not wish men to do to me, I also do not wish to do to men."

Perfect virtue is, "not to do to others as you would not wish done to yourself."

Asked, "Is there one word which may serve as a rule of practice for all one's life?" Confucius answered, "Is not Reciprocity such a word?"

"What you do not want done to yourself, do not to others."

"What you do not like, when done to yourself, do not do to others."

One of the ways of the superior man is "to set the example in behaving to a friend as I would require him to behave to me."

Isocrates (four hundred years before the publication of the gospels) said, "Do not to others that which would offend you if they should do it to you" (Guizot's translation in note to Gibbon's History of Christianity, p. 77).

Diogenes Laertius relates that Aristotle (died after 322 B.C.), being asked how we ought to conduct ourselves toward our friends, answered, "As we would wish they would carry themselves toward us" (Pick's "Talmud—What is it?" p. 130).

Many others said the same thing, and the teaching is one of human experience that must go back far into the mists of time.

Dr. Pick (ibid. 129) referring to Hillel's version of the Golden Rule, which is negative after the manner of Confucius, says: "We must bear in mind the wide interval between the merely negative rule of the Jewish president and the positive precept of the divine master." This objection is not valid, as though negative in form, it is still a positive command; but as a matter of fact Confucius gives it in both forms, and others in the positive form before Jesus. As a matter of fact again, in the "Teachings of the Twelve Apostles," discovered some years back, Jesus's teaching is actually given in the negative form of Confucius, thus: "Whatsoever thou wouldst not have befall thee, do not thou to another." Many Christian authorities believe the "Teachings of the Twelve Apostles" to be older than any of the four gospels. If so, here is a dilemma for such as Dr. Pick.

In our examination we have found nothing to admire in the Sermon on the Mount except a few teachings that Jesus has borrowed from other men; and he has generally perverted even these in re-echoing them. In practical and religious life Christians themselves disclaim or ignore the teachings almost from start to finish. None of them believes in the so-called blessedness of poverty, either of purse or spirit; in weeping or mourning; in hunger or thirst; they are not "beatitudes" even to Christians. All the essential precepts, those with regard to divorce and the relations of the sexes; to swearing; to mutilation of the body and throwing parts of it away; to alms-giving, love to enemies, non-resistance to evil or violence; his ideas about idleness, thrift, wealth, meekness, humility—all are rejected, in practice, by Christians, as impractical; and the ages in which some attempt was made to carry them out were ages called "dark," and are denounced by Christians as vehemently as by believers.

It will also be seen that our analysis of the alleged moral teachings of Jesus has shown that they cannot be applied to human life without disastrous consequences. We have seen that professing Christians, alleged followers of Jesus, one and all, put his asserted moral teaching on one side as impractical, and that the principles which regulate so-called Christian life are contrary to them.

There is but one explanation of all this: These teachings are impractical because Jesus (or whoever wrote his sayings if he was a myth) believed that the end of the world was so near at hand that practical teaching about life was out of place; it was not needed. He borrowed this idea, as well as many others. Before Jesus, John the Baptist, under Zoroastrian influences, had called on men: "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Mat. iii, 2). As soon as Jesus began to preach he copied John, "Repent; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Whoever formulated this teaching did it under the impression that in that very generation Jesus would return, and the kingdom of heaven be established; as in Mat. xvi, 28, where Jesus is represented as saying: "Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." (Refer also to Mark i, 15; ix, 1; xiii, 30; Luke ix, 27; xxi, 32; John xxi, 21 et seq.) It is not necessary to show how firm the belief of Jesus's followers was then that he would come again for the last day. Outside of the four gospels the New Testament is full of it. It is enough to understand the foolish and doubtless insane delusion about the coming end of the world under which Jesus and his followers spoke and taught. As the end of the world was at hand, questions of how to lead a proper worldly life did not concern Jesus, and his whole teaching is that men should disregard this life and spend what little time is left in getting ready for the end so near. Bearing these facts in mind, and they are notorious, it is easy to understand how it came about that the teachings of Jesus, in the Sermon on the Mount and elsewhere, were so useless and impractical. They were uttered under one of the grossest of delusions; were formulated for a supposed very short period of time, and for supposed conditions that never did exist. As the end of the world did not come when Jesus predicted it, he is thus himself convicted of being what he called others—a false prophet. As the end did not come, and we know cannot come in the way he predicted, the system of alleged moral teachings which he devised to meet the circumstances falls to the ground, as utterly useless and unsuited to any age or time that ever did or ever will exist. And the knowledge of the false idea under which the teaching was uttered explains why it is itself false and useless.

It is not necessary to suppose that at first Jesus was dishonest. He was led on to further complications of perplexity by his self-delusions. But in view of the absurd pretensions that he made and that his followers still make for him, it is necessary to point out that, while at first not claiming to be the messiah, he did afterwards dishonestly waver, then secretly encourage the claim, and that after he had become fully committed to the entanglements of the situation he probably went insane or was on the verge of insanity. The belief in the nearness of the end of the world was, however, one of his strongest convictions; consequently his teachings have no sort of value for us, except to be studied as curiosities of delusion and fanaticism. We know that he did not know what he was talking about when he spoke of these "earthly things," and we have no reason to suppose that he had any better information about "heavenly things."

CHAS. B. COOPER.

The Cause in Oregon.

It is not because we are not making progress that I have not written "The Cause in Oregon" for so long a time. We are making that kind of progress which is substantial, in that the work goes on from week to week with ever-increasing interest.

Interest in our work is not confined to this state, as each week brings letters of inquiry for suggestions, etc., for Secular Sunday-schools, and if all to whom we have sent constitution and by-laws, leaflets, etc., with suggestions "how to organize," are going ahead with the work, many children are being taken away from the Christian strongholds, the Christian Sunday-schools.

The Forest Grove circuit, Mrs. A. E. Barker, lecturer, is not only flourishing finely, with its large Secular Sunday-school, its Young People's Ethical Society, its Free Reading Room, of which Mrs. Barker is librarian, but this noble worker has extended her circuit to include McMinnville, so that now she speaks in Forest Grove the first and third Sundays, and in McMinnville the second and last Sundays of each month, lecturing at neighboring places during the week.

Since my resignation as lecturer of the First Secular church of Portland, this circuit has been in charge of Nettie A. Olds, who lectures twice a month, is leader of the choir, and superintendent of the Secular Sunday-school.

The Sunday-school is now in better condition than it ever was. It is the regular meetings, and regular lecturers, which keep up the interest and which will make our cause popular and influential for good.

Last Sunday I made my first visit to the birthplace of the Oregon State Secular Union, Silverton, lecturing in the afternoon and evening. In the afternoon my text was: "And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" (1 Cor. xv, 14), and judging from the applause of the audience, it was proven to its satisfaction that the story of the resurrection is a most absurd one, viewed from the Christian standpoint, but a pretty figure of speech when unlocked by the astronomical key which reveals the origin of Easter. In the evening my subject was "Special Providence." We have a host of good friends in Silverton and, I might add, most of them were as discouraged as most of the Secularists of Oregon had become before the incorporation of the Union and adoption of its present methods; but the outlook now for arousing new interest in the Union, and establishing a Secular Sunday-school, is bright indeed, and we soon hope to have another circuit with Silverton as the center.

Dr. J. W. McClure, whose keen logic and extensive knowledge of history make him a power for Secularism, presided at both meetings. The doctor is one of our most fearless champions and I was glad to meet him. L. Ames, who arranged for the lectures, is one of our friends who shows his "faith by his works;" he is not an enthusiast, but, like M. Fitzgerald, is always ready when there is work needed for the cause. I was delighted to grasp the hands of so many of our old friends. What Secularist who is at all acquainted with the history of Oregon Secularism does not remember Wright Forshay, the Allens, Downs, Geers, Mounts, and Wolfards? It was inspiring to meet them all. Among the younger element I was pleased to meet Mr. Geer, about twenty years old, exceptionally bright and earnest with the enthusiasm of youth. I feel greatly indebted to Miss Wolff, who added much to the evening entertainment by playing several fine selections on the piano. Miss Wolff is a thorough Secularist, and she is proud of it. Oh, if we only had more such brave young women, not afraid to publicly identify themselves with what is sometimes called "our unpopular cause." If all were brave and outspoken as our Silverton friends, if there were fewer "policy" Liberals, Secularism would long ago have ceased to be unpopular in other localities. Miss Wolff will make a splendid superintendent of the Secular Sunday-school, and the presence at the meetings of so many bright-looking children and young men and women, gives shining hopes for a large Sunday-school at Silverton. While here I enjoyed the hospitality of Mrs. Wolfard, at the Wolfard Hotel. No one would think that this sweet-faced, young-looking woman is "grandma," but she is, and all the children and grandchildren seem to have inherited her smiles. In this home are music and flowers and everything which tends to make "paradise on earth."

Among those who became members of the Oregon State Secular Union are Edward Meyers, F. H. Downing, P. J. Dickerson, John Hicks, H. S. Von Volkenburg, Hallie Smith, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Guiss, C. W. Turner, Mrs. James Downs, J. H. Marshbanks, W. C. and H. S. Mount, H. L. Eisenhart, W. R. Smith, T. D. Allen, and Pearl W. Geer.

Woodburn is the home of our third vice-president, R. H. Scott, and his family, and on my return from Silverton I had the pleasure of enjoying the hospitality of these splendid people. Mr. Scott is one of our well-to-do Secularists, and stands by the cause with his money as well as his work; and what a charming family he has! The gentle wife and mother is idolized, and everywhere is seen that tender regard, that sweet affection one for the other, which makes this home a happy one and its example a power for good. No family in Marion county is held in higher esteem. After I had visited their comfortable home, seen their bright daughters and stalwart sons, I was proud indeed that the Secularists of Oregon had chosen R. H. Scott as one of the executive committee of the Oregon State Secular Union. Prof. W. J. Wirtz, of Forest Grove, has been licensed by the executive committee and will be put in charge of the new circuit to be organized in Tillamook county. Professor Wirtz is a phrenologist and will be indulgent and generous towards his opponents, for he realizes that people cannot do as they wish, but as they must, and he will be able to scientifically demonstrate to others why this is true.

And speaking of phrenology, let me ask your readers if they all know the merits of that splendid publication written by Edgar C. Beall entitled "The Brain and the Bible," with a preface by Colonel Ingersoll. In my opinion this is one of the finest books written and ought to be in every home. Those living in or near Portland can obtain the book of W. E. Jones, 291 Alder street, who, with his wife, is doing so much to make people think for themselves.

I would prefer to stop with this item, but, friends of Secularism, we need your help and we want you to know it. This is the third year we have tried to carry on this regular work with never enough money contributed to pay even running expenses. Those of you who are not helping to pay a regular lecturer and maintaining a Secular Sunday-school, and even if you are, will you not come to the rescue and help us out financially?

The building erected in the Oregon Secular Park is still without a roof, and the rain is ruining the floor; there is no money in the treasury to buy shingles, or properly inclose the building, or to build the necessary steps from the railroad and river, and it is very important that these improvements should be made right away. We want to send delegates to our legislature to work for the repeal of laws that exempt church property from taxation, but we lack the money to do it; we even lack funds to carry on our Secular Sunday-school work properly.

Only a few days ago I met one of our best friends, who, upon being told of the financial condition of the Union, handed me a dollar, saying, "We ought to have sent in some money long ago, but have been neglecting to do so." How many more are there like this? Do you realize that a few of us are working all the time and making sacrifices every day to do what is being done? Are you not willing to make some sacrifices too?

Since last report the following contributions have been received: O. Nelson, Joseph Rich, B. F. Linn, each $1; Mrs. A. De Peatt, F. S. and Ruth Brettel, each 50 cents; R. H. Scott, $5.00.

KATIE KEHM SMITH,
Sec. Oregon State Secular Union.

Two Clergymen Want a Guardian.

We are sorry to see that two real good ministers of Newark were wickedly persecuted a few days ago by a heartless lawyer. These ministers have a mission to supervise the art and literature of the Newarkers, and in the course of their laudable labors they swore out a warrant for the arrest of Russell Brant, a newsdealer of that city. The pictures were in a New York illustrated weekly, and the one which most seriously perturbed the dominions was that of a young woman in a college dormitory kicking a football. She was dressed in short skirts and corsets. A jury of six was impaneled and the pictures were closely examined. Assistant City Attorney Cross called one of the complainants, Rev. F. C. S. Jones, as the first witness, and he told how he and the other preacher had determined upon a crusade against such publications. He said that these pictures had a tendency to arouse improper thoughts in certain minds and should be suppressed.

"Did it arouse such thoughts in your mind?" asked William B. Guild, counsel for Brant.

"No, sir. Being a servant of the Lord, it would not do so now, but there was a time when it might have done so."

"When was that?"

"I should judge that it was when I was between fifteen and nineteen years old," the clergyman said.

After a fruitless discussion as to what constituted an indecent picture, Lawyer Guild produced a handsome edition of the Bible in which the principal illustration was a representation of Adam and Eve without any covering on them.

"Would that excite improper thoughts?" asked the lawyer.

"In some minds it might," replied the clergyman.

"What do you think of it?"

"Well, I wouldn't care to have such a work in my family."

Lawyer Guild next exhibited an artistic copy of Milton's "Paradise Lost," illustrated by Doré. Mr. Jones thought even less of it than of the Bible.

"How comes it that these works are found in the educated families of the country?" asked the lawyer.

"It is simply an exhibition of the low moral state of the American public," was the clergyman's explanation.

Rev. Mr. Millington said emphatically that the pictures complained of were designed and calculated to breed impure thoughts.

"Did they have that effect upon you?" Lawyer Guild asked.

"I had to be on my guard to see that they did not," replied Mr. Millington.

"Now, let's understand this thing clearly," remarked the lawyer. "Do you wish to be understood as saying that you felt a temptation as a result of looking at the pictures?"

"That is the truth, and I wish to be so understood. The pictures were drawn for such a purpose and they are calculated to have that effect, and do have it."

"Speak for yourself."

"They arouse a temptation in the mind of any person looking at them," Mr. Millington said with measured emphasis.

"Hear me out," said Lawyer Guild.

"I decline," retorted the clergyman.

"You must, for more reasons than one," the lawyer said, and the spectators giggled.

The lawyer talked for a long while. Then the jury went into a room for half an hour, and when they came back it was with the report that Newsdealer Brant was not guilty. An appeal was taken.

From which it appears that the "certain minds" which the ministers were afraid would be corrupted were their own. But was there anything bad in the picture that was not first in their own minds?

Mrs. Stanton's Opinion as to Living Pictures.

Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton has not the slightest sympathy with the crusade against the living pictures, either here or in England, and deprecates the mock modesty of those women who frown upon all public exhibitions of the nude, whether in art or in assisting in the study of medicine.—Rochester Union and Advertiser.

The largest diamond in the world was found June 30th, 1893, in the Cape Colony mines by the inspector, Ed Jorgansen. It weighs 971½ carats, and is valued at $5,000,000. This is of little interest to Freethinkers, who seldom indulge in diamonds of that value.

News and Notes.

While the storms were raging in other parts of the country and the snow was falling fast, in San Marcial the weather was like paradise. Warm and golden sunshine fell on the wide plains and lofty mountains. The blue dome shone with delightful effulgence, and made the desert sand glitter almost like a marble floor. My friend Tibbetts owns a gallant team, and with this I had several drives over the sparsely inhabited country. For miles not a house could be seen, only rocks and rocks and sands and sands, with now and then a wandering herd or a coyote or wildcat. I do not see how these lands can ever be cultivated or be used for anything else than extensive pastures. Among the foothills, however, many fruits can be abundantly produced, and with irrigation alfalfa can grow in vast quantities. The river, Rio Grande, is almost dry at some seasons of the year, but when the snows melt it spreads miles in width and the tributary streams roll and roar like cataracts. It is an interesting country to traverse, for at times you might imagine you were in hades, there is such a perfect desolation in the aspect. You might easily imagine that one could dry up and blow away in these arid regions. Far around the horizon stretch the mountains in every variety of form and make a grotesque frame for the level mesas and winding cañons through whose rocky pathways one must slowly travel. Once in a while a ranch strikes upon the view, with green trees, orchards, and evidences of comfort and growth. I visited Fort Craig, an abandoned government post. It was built, I believe, during the Mexican war, and round about some straggling battles have been fought. This is the home of Captain Jack Crawford. It is a lonely-looking place, and you wouldn't think as you came toward it from the almost untraveled plains that any human being was to be seen. It was quite a surprise to be ushered into a pleasant room, to view literary and art treasures, curios, and many relics of Indian life mingling with the pictures of civilization. Our party received a warm welcome from Mrs. Crawford and her daughters; and it was quite a romantic contrast amidst such barren surroundings where you might think you were millions of years behind the times in the first formations of geological eras, when the world was in the making, to be all at once at the hearthstone of civilized life, and witness the grace and ornament of the nineteenth century. This is one of the surprises of this enormous Western country, that when you think you are outside the bounds of human existence, where even vegetation can scarcely flourish, in a moment at some turn of the road you catch a vision of our foremost progress. Oftentimes in the loneliest places, with the most uncouth habiliments, I meet college educated men. I meet scholars and poets, and those who dress in rags will haul out a bag full of twenty-dollar gold pieces with the nonchalance of a millionaire. It is a wonderful panorama of nature and of man in infinit variety that unfolds in this country which still has before it such boundless possibilities.

I gave six lectures in all at San Marcial, and the audiences increased each evening. Of course in a place of this kind great results cannot be accomplished. It is on the frontier. Outside of it is a territory comparatively unoccupied. The railroad is what gives it the breath of civilization. But there are staunch comrades here. The railroad men read and think. There is a fine reading-room connected with the station, and first-class papers and periodicals are at hand. This community will compare favorably with any other community for information and enterprise. Considering all the circumstances of the case, I am well satisfied with the pioneer work accomplished. A foundation has been laid for future progress, and a comradeship established.

I am under many obligations to Mr. Howard, editor of the San Marcial Bee, who has been fair-minded in all his notices of the lectures. He is willing to give both sides a hearing, and shows a true newspaper ability in keeping up with the times.

Dr. Cruikshanks returned in season for the last lecture. I was glad to meet with this genuine Liberal. He was unavoidably absent at the beginning of the campaign, but he is always ready to stand by the colors. He is a Freethinker to the core.

On Friday evening I leave San Marcial and the home of the Ribleys, where the Secular Pilgrim has generous entertainment, and take my way to Arizona. No finer sky ever spread over the earth than the sky of that lovely golden evening. The river glistened in its beams, and as the soft darkness mingled with the illuminations of the departing day, and the moon rode aloft in gorgeous splendor, it seemed as if I was in one of the mighty palaces of nature's original régime, where gentle fairies flit and flash in the glorious luster. But when I went forth from Albuquerque the heavy clouds rolled over the moon; by midnight a great wind was blowing. It howled and thundered as if trying to overthrow the train. When I arrived at Flagstaff the next day noon, among the primeval forests, it was raining and snowing. At Ash Fork I change cars for Prescott, and the outlook is by no means promising for fair weather. It was quite a change from the almost tropical splendor of New Mexico. I receive a warm welcome at my point of destination from Dr. Miller, J. Rosenbury, and others. Sunday morning dawned with a cloudy sky, but with great patches of blue, which indicated that the storm was about over. I lectured on Sunday afternoon and evening to fair audiences. I have made a good beginning, I think, for the month's campaign, seeing that the churches have joined forces for a big revival. There is a large Liberal element in this community, and I believe it can be brought to the front and organized for effective service. Now that Arizona is about to become a state, the Freethought forces must be organized in order to bring it into the union on a purely secular basis. This is the object of the work now opened at Prescott. I shall be here for a month, lecturing week-days and Sundays. I expect also to lecture in some of the neighboring mining camps and at Phoenix and Tempe. I shall also give five lectures at Tucson. I believe that Arizona is one of the best places on the continent for the Liberal advance. The present campaign is under the management of Dr. J. Miller, of Prescott, well known throughout the territory, one of its foremost citizens, who has the courage and determination to make success, if possible. I hope that all Freethinkers throughout Arizona will join in this great undertaking and communicate with Dr. Miller. Let us organize to put Arizona in the shining ranks of progress. It needs but a few bold leaders to win a decisive victory.

Arizona is a wonderful country. I believe the evidences go to show that this is the first spot on this planet where man appeared. There are relics of humanity which go back undoubtedly ten thousand years. There are the remains of the Cliff-dwellers, mummies, hieroglyphics, etc. Dr. Miller and others of my Freethought friends have made a great study of these things, and I expect to give some interesting information to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER from these enthusiastic investigators. I expect to plunge back into the farthest centuries of human history, through the dim corridors of time, amidst these marvelous regions. Arizona is packed with ancient treasures, and the mind can revel in untrodden paths of discovery. I shall have a month of delightful labors, seeing humanity in its present most vivid and unique aspects—civilization on the frontier. I shall also behold some of the grandest scenery in the world. I shall look upon volcanic spaces of desolation, and travel along the highway of primeval man, and from these glimpses of the immeasurable past find inspiration for the glorious future. To-day is a beautiful day, soft and splendid as the springtime of the East, and I anticipate a whole month of such gorgeous weather. Pioneer work has its zest and beauty, and even if we do have to work hard and meet all sorts of bad luck, and push through mud and snow and rain, and sleep on the soft side of a board, still there is a freshness and glory connected with this life that one can't find in all the luxury of wealth and ease, and we are amply repaid for the aches and pains we suffer.

After I finish in Arizona I shall be at Santa Fé, New Mexico, and Trinidad, Colorado, and I hope that friends in the latter state will open up some other places for work. Keep on the move.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Campaign Book.

The following have contributed for the books of our joint Congress: Jerry C. Brown, 50 copies; John Dietmeyer, 18 copies; Stephen Brewer, 8 copies; Willett Phillips, 8 copies; P. F. Spencer, 1 copy. I should like to have many more friends help us to get this book into the hands of thousands that are not with us, but soon will be. It will give all the addresses delivered by our leading lecturers in the Freethought field, well as the report of the treasurer how, and for what, the money has been expended (every contributor should know that); the names of all donors to the Congress, as well as the fight in Washington and Albany; and the book will show how little money we have had, and the great work that has been accomplished. It will give encouragement to those who stand for human emancipation. I consider it a great wrong to compel us to respect and help maintain an institution (the church) in which we do not believe. We demand that church property be no longer exempt from taxation. We want to push those ideas to the front and vote for the legislators who will help us. We are strongly opposed to contributing to the churches, and want them to pay their own way as we pay ours.

Freethought and Secular Notes from England.

"A HAPPY NEW YEAR."

The above is my hearty greeting to the thousands of Freethinkers who reside in the United States and Canada. True happiness should be the aim of all; but with our Secular friends its realization ought to be deemed of the first importance. Many Christians seek to console themselves for the lack of human sunshine on earth by indulging in hopes of a better state of things in a place they term heaven. Secularists, on the contrary, believing that "now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation," strive to experience as much as possible that happiness which is based upon freedom, justice, and honor, and which sheds a halo of comfort and joy upon mundane existence. From a Freethinker's point of view the only compensation that lies in the future for all the drawbacks of the past and the present is an improvement in this world, which is the only one of which we have any knowledge. The surest plan to secure such an improvement is united action in continuing the warfare against ignorance and superstition—the legacies of a domineering church and of a usurping aristocracy. The fact that the success which has hitherto been won in this direction is the result of secular effort should inspire the friends of progress in every clime to endeavor to make the new year more prolific for good than any of its predecessors have been. Such useful conduct will be the best contribution that can be given to the promotion of personal happiness and to the augmentation of national greatness.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS IN ENGLAND.

Despite the advancement that has been made of late on this side of the Atlantic our present social relations are still in a most appalling condition. Poverty with its innumerable and heart-rending evils extensively abounds; men, women, and children are enduring the most intense suffering through the want of food, clothing, and shelter, while many die from the bitter pangs of starvation; thousands of men who are able and willing to work can obtain no employment, and money which is necessary to the efficient use of labor is monopolized by the few. Now it appears to me that whatever the immediate causes of this sad state of affairs may be, the original cause was the impotency of theology to produce a justly arranged condition of society. Things are as they are as the result of centuries of misrule. And it must be remembered that it was during these very centuries that the church held absolute sway. It controlled the state, the schools, and the masses. Every policy not in favor of the church was bitterly opposed. For ages the people were deprived of all means of self-help, science was condemned, and true education was entirely ignored. It was a period of theological supremacy and priestly government. "By their fruits ye shall know them." The objectionable fruits we have in our midst are inequalities, injustice, and direful misery; the trees that bore these fruits were theology and superstition; therefore our business as real reformers is to do our best to destroy what remains of these poisonous influences and thereby clear the way for the cultivation of those agencies that will improve the social status of the general community.

PROGRESS IN 1894.

Fortunately, theology having been deprived of the supremacy it once commanded, we are progressing, slowly though it be, from the degradation of the past. Politically but little reform has been accomplished during the year 1894. This has not been because no attempts have been made in that direction, for many useful measures have been introduced and passed in the House of Commons, but because the House of Lords, true to its traditions, has destroyed the useful work of the representatives of the people. There are, however, strong indications that this upper chamber, composed as it is of what John Bright termed "moral invalids and intellectual imbecils," will shortly be deprived of much of its power for evil. In social and secular matters, decided advancement of which we may be justly proud has been made in the year just departed. For instance, the rural population has been rescued from the merciless grasp of the parson and squire; the sons of toil in our towns and cities have had some useful legislative reforms in their favor whereby shorter hours, better wages, and healthier conditions in their workshops have been secured; orthodoxy has received some powerful shocks; criticism upon the Bible by Christians has been more outspoken than ever, and purely Secular education has won a higher position than it ever previously occupied in this country.

A SOCIAL REVOLUTION.

The passing through Parliament of the great measure known as the "Parish Councils bill" was the prelude to the greatest social revolution that has ever taken place in England. In spite of the persistent opposition of the clergy the bill became law and its results up to the present have been most satisfactory. Lord Rosebery in a recent speech spoke thus of the charter of the agricultural population:

"Think, gentlemen, what that means. Twenty-four thousand elections where elections were never held before; ninety thousand men, probably most of them for the first time, given a share in the responsibilities of their rural localities. Think of the new upheaval and wakening into life that this bill, by one magic touch, has called into being right through the rural districts of England and Wales. I think if you can measure that fact—and those can measure it who are conversant with rural localities—you will admit that no greater boon has ever been given to the peasantry of England than the right and the power to take an interest in their own immediate affairs.

It may be truly said that if this measure stood alone as the one accomplishment of the year it would mark a great stride onward, inasmuch as its effect for good has been felt in those places where the ideal of social equality and political rights has been the weakest. The artisans of our towns have to a large extent learned the lesson of self-government, and the new law has given to the rural population a good start in the same direction. It has brought to their doors the possibilities of citizenship. In many places where the year 1894 dawned upon villages plunged in profound apathy, crushed under the heel of landlordism, submissive to a degree but one remove from slavery and with but the feeblest hope of rising above it, it has closed upon a scene of manly awakening, of social aspirations, of upper-class rage and defeat, and working-class exhilaration at the possession of new powers. This may be fairly claimed as being an advance in the direction of a true ideal that will mark 1894 as a historic year in the story of the progress of the English people.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

Observations.

The following remarks by "Antichrist" throw light upon a topic mentioned in this column last week: "The recent revisers of the English translation of the New Testament are not the first to interpolate 'daughter' after 'virgin' in 1 Cor. vii, 36. In Dr. Murdock's 'literal translation from the Syriac Peshito version,' published in 1851, the passage reads as follows: 'But if any one thinketh that there is reproach, on account of his maiden [daughter], because she hath passed her time, and he hath not presented her to a husband, [and] it be fitting that he present her; let him do what he desireth, he sinneth not; let her be married.' The word 'daughter' is bracketed by Dr. Murdock, and is interpolated because of what follows in the text, especially by the words we have italicized, which are wanting in the Greek and Latin codices. Those words clearly imply that by 'maiden' or 'virgin' the writer of the epistle meant daughter." With a uniformity quite unusual to inspired writings, all the versions of Paul's epistle represent the author as addressing his advice about the disposition of the virgin to the old man instead of the girl—as though the maiden herself had no voice in the matter. Contemporary discussion of an allied subject will hit off my point. The Goshen, Ind., News has this item: "Being informed that Kendalville is to have a baby show in a few weeks, the editor of the Kendalville Sun (a family man) says it strikes him that more time should be given to prepare for it." Commenting upon which another editor suggests: "We think this is a matter that might be left to the ladies." Thus should the editor of the Corinthian Capital have rebuked the interference of Paul the tenderfoot in the family affairs of his subscribers.

Events of great moment are occurring in Spiritualistic circles. In the Banner of Light is to be found an article under the head of "Disappearance of Medial Limbs," wherein some most startling things are set forth. The account states nothing less than this: At a seance given by Mme. Esperance, the visitors noted that the medium showed symptoms of excitement and appeared to be in pain. A few moments later she asked a neighbor to let her take his hand, which he did, whereupon she said "Feel here," and put his hand where her person should have come in contact with her seat, but he felt only the chair. Another gentleman joined the first in a search for the lower parts of the medium without success, and then it dawned on the medium and the visitors that she had become dematerialized from the waist downward. This fact was held to account for Mme. Esperance's excitement, as it well might, especially as she expressed a fear that perhaps the parts would not return. That thought, she said, made her nervous. The affair occurred in Helsingfors, Finland, and the account is related by a native, which shows that we of America, though talented, are not in all respects superior to the inhabitants of the Old World. Such local dematerialization, unless brought under control, would seriously interfere, I should surmise, with ordinary feminine activities.

Long distance telephone connection with the rest of the world was lately opened up at Lafayette, Indiana. The mayor of that burg presided over the ceremonies incident to the great event, and startled the mayor of New York with the following language over the wires:

God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform. We dedicate this great improvement to the labor of Christian civilization.

I suppose that the mayor of Lafayette, Indiana, swallows the story of Balaam's jackass addressing a short-distance communication to its owner, and imagines that his own ability to converse with Mayor Gilroy, much farther away, tastes like the same kind of a miracle.

A few days ago a number of distinguished functionaries and rambunctious of the Roman Catholic church in this city held a meeting, and among other routine work turned out a handsome job of excommunicating. The first to suffer this process were the members of Masonic lodges, who have been excommunicated so often that by this time they should take such a thing as a matter of course. I never heard of a Freemason who was or desired to be a Catholic. The church's grievance against that order is that many Catholics want to be Masons, and it is to head off these straying lambs that action is taken by the priests, bishops, archbishops, and cardinals. There are about three quarters of a million of Masons in the United States and British Columbia, so that the Roman hierarchy must know that in their cutting off a good many citizens are not only alienated from the church but practically damned.

Other orders were similarly treated. By some papers it is reported that the Odd Fellows were condemned; also the Knights of Pythias and Sons of Temperance. The Odd Fellows have an even larger membership than the Masons, while the Sir Knights are not far behind. The Sons of Temperance number perhaps one hundred thousand, hence the four bodies taken together have at least two million members. Now, if we exercise our memory to the extent of recollecting that the Catholic church is the recruiting office for the king of heaven's army, and that none may otherwise enlist, the seriousness of the measure which forever disqualifies these two millions, and presumably their posterity, must burst upon us with great force.

The point I wish to get at in calling attention to this matter has reference to the organization best known as the A. P. A., whose members, I understand, swear a mighty oath that they will not employ Roman Catholics or vote for them. The Catholic press, priests, and politicians call members of the A. P. A. a bigoted lot of people, and perhaps they are, the great majority of them being Protestant Christians; but just now I would adopt the you're-another-method and inquire how a church which incontinently cuts off two millions of people from the hope of salvation can have any complaint against a rival organization that denies to members of said church only temporal jobs and political offices. Would the Catholic maintain that the boycott is a more serious matter than the curse of Rome? Does he desire to illustrate to the A. P. A. the golden rule of Jehovah?—"You love your enemies and elect them; I will damn mine."

When the editor of the Freethought Magazine said that in his opinion the most diabolical crime a person could commit was a violation of the Comstock law, I endeavored to show him that he could not mean what he said. Mr. Green assures the public that he spoke advisedly, and that while the circulation of obscene literature is not the "greatest" of crimes, it is the most "diabolical." That which is diabolical is of the devil, I believe, though the word has been secularized to mean atrocious, nefarious, or outrageously wicked; and Mr. Green asks of me, "Will you please tell us what is more diabolical, infernal, and nefarious than to mail to young people lewd pictures—real obscene literature?" To which I reply that I will name three things—to wit: religious persecution, rape, and arson. I mention these for the purpose of impressing Mr. Green, though assault and battery, slander, or sheep stealing would be sufficient for the purpose. But I desire to add that whatever degree of crime there may be in the circulation of obscene literature, it is a virtue in comparison with the outrages committed under the law designed for its suppression.

People are given to suffer the loss of their heads on the two kindred subjects of blasphemy and obscenity. That this is true as to blasphemy Mr. Green will agree with me, and it will be further demonstrated by a letter which appeared in a Minneapolis paper just before Colonel Ingersoll's lecture in that city. The writer, like Mr. Green, seeks to clinch his argument with an unanswerable question. He says:

History tells us that Tamerlane, an oriental conqueror, at one of his carnivals, built ten thousand of the inhabitants, alive, one upon the other until they formed a tower of human beings, and cemented each layer to the next by mortar, as if they were bricks instead of men. At another scene of conviviality he built a pyramid composed entirely of the heads of ninety thousand of his captives, and yet which is the greater human monster, or guilty of the blacker crime, Tamerlane, the barbarian of the dark ages, or this carping impostor of the nineteenth century [Ingersoll], seeking to misguide his fellow-mortals to their utter destruction and eternal ruin?

So much for the distracting influence of religious fanaticism; and I maintain that the extravagance of the language would not be diminished if the violator of the Comstock postal law were substituted for the blasphemer, as Mr. Green would do. Neither is it more extravagant than his own; for Tamerlane's crime, though a diabolical one, would, according to the meaning of Mr. Green's statement, fall below that of the circulator of lewd pictures in atrocity; and this shows the distracting influence of unnatural views of morality. The other day Judge C. L. Benedict sentenced Seeley, the thieving bank cashier, to eight and one-half years' imprisonment. Seeley stole $350,000, so that his expiation will be at the rate of $41,000 or so per year. In 1879 the same Judge Benedict sentenced D. M. Bennett to the penitentiary for thirteen months for mailing "Cupid's Yokes," showing that he deemed that offense equal to the theft of between $40,000 and $50,000. Had the charge been blasphemy the sentence would have been equally just, and I have no doubt it would have been pronounced.

Mr. Green advises me to stick to my jokes, which I should be quite reconciled to do if I could depend on him to pay proper attention to the facts.

KEWANEE, ILL., Dec. 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $10—two years' subscription, renewal for my ohm and myself. Happy New Year!

N.B.—I am seventy-nine years old, and may not have to renew subscription again, but will do so as long as I can read your TRUTH SEEKER.

We Wish You had the Million.

UNION, OR., Dec. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: All I can send you to-day is $3, but I will send some more soon. How I wish I had a million; I would send you $10,000.

If you ever see the gentlemen Putnam and Bell give them my kind regards. They will remember me as county judge, when they lectured here in early times.

E. C. BRAINARD.

It is Shield and Buckler and Sword.

PRESCOTT, A. T., Dec. 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6. Please continue the good old paper, for it is my bosom companion, and also a weapon against Christian lies. It has been a help to me in the hour of sadness. May the good work go on until this world shall be banded together in true brotherhood and fellowship. Yours for truth and justice,

J. W. ROBERTS.

LODI, WIS., Dec. 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I will now acknowledge the receipt of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," although I received it some time ago. I have read it carefully through and am nearly through it again, and find it one of the grandest and noblest works I ever saw; so full of knowledge and so plain and easy to understand.

Friend Putnam has done a good work, sure, for mankind. N. C. SKELTON.

What One-eighth of a Dollar Did.

TOWNVILLE, S. C., Dec. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I have recently had my "eyes opened" by reading the "Age of Reason" by Thomas Paine, and want further information. You advertise "full list of publications free;" please send me the same. My heavens! what a dupe I have been regarding Christianity! I am anxious to see the truth; am willing to pay for the same as soon as I sell my cotton.

Very respectfully, F. A. DANIELS.

Ignorant of Their Own Bible.

WALLA WALLA, WASH., Dec. 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to pay my subscription, and for books as per inclosed list. Money is very scarce, but I don't see how I could do without the paper. I have quite a lot of TRUTH SEEKER books and loan them when I can find anyone who will read them, and I know they have done some good. It is surprising how little some good Christians know even of their own so-called "Holy Bible."

W. A. SHELTON.

Dare Not Practice Jesus's Precepts.

OREGON, ARK., Dec. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to extend my subscription. This is all I can do at present. I am making arrangements for Mr. S. P. Putnam to lecture in Harrison, Ark., on his return from Kansas; I think he could come down through southwest Missouri and northwest Arkansas. This, I think, is a good field in which to work. I broke the ice here years ago, and there are great many Liberal-minded people here. I keep it warm here for the Christians; I tell them they cannot do what the Bible God and Jesus Christ tell them to do, and keep out of the penitentiary.

W. B. BRUCE.

Prayers Probably Misdirected.

ANSELM, N. D., Dec. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1. Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for four months. I am lonesome without it. It is a shining light for the nineteenth century. Times are hard in some parts of the state; the Bible God did not favor us all with rain. I suppose somebody has been praying to the wrong God, and he has poured out his wrath on some of the worst of us. The Christians are holding prayer-meetings here now, and I suppose we will be favored with better times soon. We have a few Liberals out hereabouts and can hold our own. I will try to get you some subscribers this winter.

ANDY CARR.

A Pertinent Query.

FAIRFAX, MINN., Dec. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Where were the Christians' chief God—the Lord God Almighty, maker and ruler of the heavens and the earth—and God the Son and God the holy ghost at the time of the bloody theological difficulty in Armenia between the Turks and Armenians? Can you inform us? Did they sit listlessly by and permit the followers of the Turk's God to indiscriminately shed the blood of their devoted followers, including innocent women and children? Did they desert them? Or had they gone off on a distant journey beyond hearing. No evidence appears that they did so much at the time as to issue a protest, or even to lift a finger to arrest or stop the bloody carnage waged against the followers of Christ.

GEO. DAVIS.

GROVE CITY, O., Dec. 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: My books came in good shape. That big book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," I like very much. I have read it two-thirds through, and the more I read the better I like it. I lent those eight copies of the "Age of Reason," some of them the second time. So far as I have heard, they gave satisfaction. Now I want the ANNUAL FOR 1895, Ingersoll's "Holy Bible," "Shakespeare," "Tale of a Halo," and "Right Living."

My TRUTH SEEKER comes regularly. I am so well pleased with it that I started out yesterday afternoon to get a few subscribers. I got six trial subscriptions; that is the best I could do. I made Christmas presents of part of them. I send you $5 for papers and books.

WM. NEISWENDER.

The Laborers Are Few.

FREEPORT, ILL., Dec. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the ANNUAL for 1895. Send "Prof. Ernst Haeckel: His Life, Work, Career, and Prophecy," by Thaddeus B. Wakeman. I think I can sell a half dozen or dozen of the ANNUAL. I have been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year and a half, and I think it one of the best of papers. I deeply regret the fact that the Freethinkers are not more thoroughly organized, especially in this large city.

I am an enthusiast, and have been so since a boy; read the "Age of Reason" at the age of fifteen, and am now (at thirty-five) an outspoken Infidel. I work at the harness trade. Just think of it; this city of fifteen thousand intelligent people has never been visited by a Freethought lecturer, but we have thirty-five to forty churches, and the woods are full of Freethinkers unorganized.

FRED E. WEISSER.

Was Adam to Blame?

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., Dec. 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I wrote yesterday, telling you not to send my paper because I could not pay for it in advance, and I did not want credit when I could not tell when and how I could pay if trusted. But since then things have changed, and now I send you an order for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the ANNUAL, with money for the same. I don't need these or any other Freethought writings to convince me that the fundamental teachings of the Christian religion are wrong, and the only wonder to me is how any one can believe that the whole human race, and snakes, were cursed because one pair of human beings ate some fruit, less than six thousand years ago, and that all men and women can be forgiven because another man was cruelly killed. Now how anyone can be justly condemned for a crime that he never committed is beyond my comprehension. Nay more, how could Adam be justly condemned if a God perfect in power, wisdom, and foreknowledge made him? Did not God design it to be as it was? Did Adam have the choice of his nature? Did not God foreknow the result, or had he not sufficient wisdom or power to prevent it? And yet Christians say that they have advanced, and Colonel Ingersoll is fighting dead creeds, while they stick to the whole Bible and its God and end every prayer with "these things we ask through the merits of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

GEO. F. ELLIOTT.

He Admires the Gems.

IPAVA, ILL., Dec. 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6.62 for books received. I shall write for more soon; am too busy just now to make out the list desired. I spend my Sundays reading the Gems of Thought out and polished by the intellectual giants dead and living. There is no other one thing that tempers the mind, harmonizes the spirit, dispels lassitude, and awakens thought in the ordinary mind so much as reading and reaping the intellectual gleanings from THE TRUTH SEEKER, which gives its readers the best clippings from Voltaire, Paine, Darwin, Bennett, Ingersoll, Lincoln, Putnam, Remsburg, Gibson, Gardener, Wixon, and thousands of others whose names do not occur to me just now. The man or woman who can break the chain of superstition and breathe the pure air in freedom's mental field is like the eagle enjoying her flight around the sun, but the man or woman who is bound or circumscribed by superstition is like the eagle that could not break the shell, alive but in eternal darkness. Wishing you a Happy New Year, and hoping the number of TRUTH SEEKER subscribers will be trebled before 1900, I am,

Yours truly, C. S. RANDOLPH.

A Minister Who Is Fresh.

BARNESVILLE, O., Jan. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am not a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I often get sample copies, and I read them with great delight and profit. I shall subscribe for your paper ere long, for I cannot do without it.

I wish to say that I am a Freethinker, and I long for the complete secularization of the state.

I will not join the A. P. A., because it is too Protestant. It is too much of a religious affair.

I have refused to join the Jr. O. U. A. M., because the order compels its members to attend church once a year, and because the order strongly advocates religious instruction and the reading of the Bible in the public school.

The M. E. preacher here in his Thanksgiving sermon said that religious instruction and the reading of the Bible in the public school shall never be prohibited and that the church would never submit to the Bible and religion being excluded from the school. He also said that church property shall never be taxed, and that the churches will not submit to taxation.

Respectfully, WM. W. SCHOLLES.

We Explained, Not Apologized.

CLINT, TEX., Dec. 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I don't know how to write or edit a news or other paper, but think I know the difference between the song of a lark and the hoot of an owl or the howl of a coyote. The letter of one M. M. Heigh-ton in your issue of the 8th inst. contains much more of the music of the latter than of the former.

The almost insolent writer accuses THE TRUTH SEEKER Editor of having purposely uttered a "half truth," and yet the Editor in a supplementary note partly apologizes to the "red-hot Republican" for not having published the result of the elections in a way to suit him. Had it not been for the explanatory note of the Editor I should have concluded that the "devil" in your printing room had slipped that letter in when the Editor's back was turned.

This gentleman from Kent, O., seems to wholly ignore the high mission and work of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to regard it as a kind of outlet for the conveyance of partisan and sectional hate. What does the poor man mean by the expression: "Hell and Texas, or perfidy and dishonor?"

Now, there is no one who more enjoys rational and truthful criticism and exhortation of the recreant, demoralized Democratic party than I do; but please deliver your readers from the splutterings of a bigoted and fanatical partisan.

I do not subscribe for and read THE TRUTH SEEKER as a political or partisan sheet. I have regarded it as working on a higher plane, and value it for its able advocacy of Freethought, civil liberty, good morals, and a broad humanity, as a substitute for the prevailing Christian superstition and a remedy for the evils of cant, hypocrisy, hatred, sectarianism, mental slavery—all growing out of that hoary establishment, "our most holy religion," and its priesthood.

Yours truly, S. G. ETHERIDGE.

Knows Now it's Full as Well as Big.

GREENHILL, O., Dec. 25, E.M. 294.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.75, as renewal, and for ANNUAL, "A Tale of a Halo," and "About the Bible."

I have just finished reading "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and am well pleased with it. Everybody ought to read it, for it is a daisy. I did not know there was so much in the Pilgrim. I was aware he had a large head, but did not know that it was so well filled.

I will say that every Liberal who has not got a copy should procure one as soon as convenient. One word for THE TRUTH SEEKER: It is doing splendidly. The corner that belongs to the man with the badge pin is all right; he gets there every time. And then that Heston, what object lessons he gives us every week, particularly Thanksgiving and Christmas. They speak volumes. I am pleased to see that some are beginning to turn their attention to finance, and that you permit it. I think that it needs ventilating. We must become Freethinkers in politics as well as in religion. Why is it that the Freethinkers still cling to the old style of A.D. 1894 instead of E.M. 294? Come, boys, let's crowd it to the front; that is the way to get there. I would like to see your paper set the example.

ENOCH WICKERSHAM.

Worse than Scotch Presbyterianism!

KAYES PARK, WIS., Dec. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1, for which send Colonel Ingersoll's four new pamphlets, "The Holy Bible," "Is Suicide a Sin," "Shakespeare," and "Lincoln." I agree with Mr. Ingersoll in a good many things, but I differ a little from him as far as he regards Scotch Presbyterianism as the worst religion. I think Danish Lutheranism a few points worse. As a child I was compelled to learn and believe its terrible dogmas; the teacher (receiving his salary from the state of Denmark) used to follow Solomon's advice about the children and the rod, and applied them both (the advice and the rod) quite freely in explaining his mysterious doctrines. Of course, as soon as I was of age to commence thinking, I began to disbelieve, and my mind was soon freed from the chains of a superstitious faith. One of the Lord's servants (who are very willing to take care of our souls, if we will take care of their bodies and let the church take care of our money) gave me a little talk last winter. He felt especially shocked that one brought up in the most holy Danish church should have wandered so far from the fold. "Well, sir," I answered, "even if I am a Dane that is no reason why I ought to be an infernal fool, though, if you judge by the Danish members of your congregation, I will allow you have cause to think so."

Yours for liberty, EMIL JOHNSON.

All but Two on the Lord's Side.

RICHWOOD, GA., Dec. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me "All About the Holy Bible," ANNUAL for 1895, "Jingles of Humor," and "A Tale of a Halo."

I send you $4.40 to pay for above, and also to renew E. R. Teal's subscription for one year with "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." I would be pleased to send you a list of subscribers from here, but there are only two people here who are out of the ark of safety, and they are E. R. Teal and myself. We live between the Holy Sanctified church and a Baptist church, and I expect we derive as much benefit from them as most of the members. This is a fine country if there was a little freedom of speech, but an Infidel has a very poor speech. I am not in any land scheme, and have no land to sell, but will be glad to have any Liberals anywhere who want to find a mild climate, with cheap productive land, write to me and I will give them all the information I can.

I think this is a fine country, and any one can do well here if he has some means to start with, but would not advise anyone to come here without means. I would like to see a good many Liberal families settle here, as it would get these people to thinking, as they imagin now there are only a very few people who do not believe in the holy humbug.

A part of the state penitentiary is located here. I notice the prisoners are all Christians in belief, and a good many of them have been baptized since coming here. They have a sermon every Sunday. The convicts work in a saw mill. One of the largest in this state is located here.

ALEXANDER ROSE.

Charles Robinson, Freethinker and True Patriot.

ATCHISON, KAN., Dec. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I see that the late Charles Robinson, the first governor of Kansas, and the pioneer Freethinker, has been honored at a meeting of the Associated Historians of America, held in the lecture hall of the National Museum in Washington. Prof. Frank W. Blackmar, of the University of Kansas, read an able and interesting paper entitled "A Chapter in the Life of Charles Robinson, the First Governor of Kansas." He referred to Robinson as the most important character in the building of the commonwealth of Kansas. "He was, on the whole," said Professor Blackmar, "the greatest leader of the free state cause." Professor Blackmar gave some interesting facts connected with the lives of John Brown and "Jim" Lane and drew a strong contrast between them and Robinson, much to the credit of the latter.

Every Freethinker in America should honor the brave old war-governor—the pioneer Freethinker of Kansas. He helped to plant the seeds of mental liberty on Kansas soil, and was one of the first to raise his voice in behalf of Freethought. At the Freethought encampments at Ottawa, Bismarck Grove, and other places, some years ago, he was a conspicuous figure, and then and there he showed that he had the courage of his convictions. The Freethinkers should erect a monument to his memory and inscribe thereon, "He fought for a free state, for free speech, and for Freethought."

Yours, GEO. J. REMSBURG.

Follow Their Blind Guides.

CENTERVILLE, CAL., Dec. 21, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me Ingersoll's "About the Holy Bible," "Lincoln," and "Shakspeare." Also a copy of the ANNUAL and "God and His Book." You will find inclosed $2.25. As far as my circumstances permit I am collecting literature on Freethought. My education is very limited so far as scholarship is concerned but I have been a close student of the Bible, and cannot make it harmonize with my own reason. Some thirty-five years ago I purchased Thomas Paine's theological works, which opened up a new field of thought to me. Before that time I dared not question the truthfulness of the Bible; it was the word of God, too sacred to be questioned, but reading Paine's works created a buoyancy of mind that I had never experienced before. Since then I have carried within me a light heart as to the future, or the present either, caring nothing for the yarns spun by the preachers who claim to be God's servants here on earth. I have now a number of Freethought books, such as J. S. Hittell's "Evidences Against Christianity," also Volney's "Ruins," and "No Beginning; or, the Fundamental Fallacy," also Bell's "Hand-Book of Freethought," and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and "History of the Bible" by Bronson C. Keeler, and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." I have lent all this literature, but few people can be induced to even examine, say nothing about reading it. They appear to be willing to believe the Bible with its lids closed, and let the preachers do the thinking and show them the way that leads to the golden stairs to the New Jerusalem.

Yours truly, a co-worker in Freethought,
JOHN J. RISER.

God With Them When in Power.

PAULINE, ARK., Dec. 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: It seems that that question, "Doth Job serve God for nought?" is pertinent at all times. The clergy pretend to serve him for money, but when they get into trouble call on the people for help.

"Whatsoever ye shall ask . . . shall be given you." "Behold I am with you always, even to the end." Under these assurances missionaries go to preach to the heathen, expecting a nation to be born in a day.

Armenians are now asking the nations for help. Where is their God? Has he not said, "No weapon formed against thee shall prosper?" Who is running the world, anyhow? Somebody has lied. Oh, yes, I see now. When Christians are in the majority wreaking vengeance with fire and sword, God is with them. And the more he is with them the more cruel they are. But when in the minority, God is never with them; then they piteously call even on their Infidel friends for help. They say it takes money to convert the world; why not "ask" God for it? They say he gives everything and does everything.

I see one Rev. Mr. Blagden frantically exclaims regarding Colonel Ingersoll, "Stop him for Christ's dear sake." That is unalloyed Christianity. Scratch a Russian and you'll find a Tartar. Rub the varnish off a Christian and you'll find, "I come to bring fire." "I come not to bring peace but a sword." Suppose they were in the majority now, and God in the Constitution, where would Freethinkers be? On the rack and in prison.

DR. BACHELOR.

Our Christian Slaves.

Jan. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: There are perhaps no greater mental slaves on earth at the present time than the so-called followers of Jesus, for it is nearly impossible to induce one to read, reason, or think for himself, as he would do in almost every business enterprise. This does not apply to the "ignorant Catholic" alone, but to all orthodox denominations.

Faith alone is based upon the utter ignorance of the real, and in its stead, a belief in the supernatural. Investigation is the water of truth that quenches the fire of ignorance; causes the collapse of the clerical purse and drives the divine teacher from his vocation. It is certain death to the cause of all religions for the followers to bask in the sunlight of truth or to know the real instead of speculating on the metaphysical.

Religion appeals to the emotional in man, and not to human reason. Song and solemn pleadings constitute the harpichord of the evangelist to play upon the weakness of his congregation, and no others are so weak as the believing women.

The flattering name of "sister" and a few prayers for her welfare are enough to draw one of them into the "fold of Jesus." Yet for such doth not her spiritual master expect remuneration from the contribution box?

Yes, and my children must seek the Lord early; they must join the Endeavor society and endeavor to believe every word the clergyman says, for hath not Jesus said "Believe, be baptized, and be saved," and "Suffer little children to come unto me"? Also, he hath proclaimed that "those that would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me."

It matters not what the truth may be, the Christian woman revels in the realms of her delusion and trains in the ranks of the Women's Christian Temperance Union and is "seen of all men." Soon her footsteps will be heard in seeking the voting precinct in obedience to her savior's demand to "slay them before me." The church will then rule supreme. Bible gems (Gen. xxxviii, 19, 39; Lev. xv, 16-33; Num. xxxi; Deut. xxiii, etc.) will be read in our public schools and Jehovah will breathe forth his foul decrees and Congress be made to pay tribute by appropriations to further his divine persecutions.

Dear neighbor and Christian friend, and all you who would do unto others as you would that they should do unto you, and follow the laws of humanity and common sense, remember, the truth seeker has the right to scorn "Jehovah's awful ways" and look to a higher god of nobler attributes and "saintly worth" for guiding inspiration to feed his soul with love and charity for his fellowman.

A. D. SWAN.

Patronize the Freethought Press and Literature.

OMAHA, NEB., Dec. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The manner in which THE TRUTH SEEKER disposed of the Chicago Inter-Ocean's criticism of Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on the Bible is alone worth the price of a year's subscription. It is a pleasure to every Freethinker who reads THE TRUTH SEEKER to know that it can defend Freethought and its lecturers against such attacks, no matter from what source they come. Thus do we see the necessity of supporting to the full extent of our ability the Freethought journals. No active and earnest Freethinker can afford to be without a paper representing our ideas. Freethought books and works on science are also very essential. The cost is little, the information is valuable. Through our press and literature the uninformed may learn what Freethought and science have done for the human race in the past, and what they are doing at the present time. And this literature should not be stowed away in book-cases while there can be found anyone who is willing and anxious to read it. The request of THE TRUTH SEEKER that each subscriber who feels so disposed make one of his friends a present of three months' subscription is a most excellent idea. After reading it three months they will, as the paper says, "want to take it right along."

THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing splendid missionary work with Paine's "Age of Reason." As the irresistible forces of nature grind down great hills and mountains, whose matter is deposited on ocean's bed, so will Paine's great flow of reason's argument crush to atoms every superstition, and bury lifeless dogmas in the sea of common sense. Preachers and others may indulge in the dishonorable (yet purely orthodox) warfare of slandering and vilifying the author of this work, yet his argument stands like Gibraltar, unshaken and unshattered; an impregnable defense of intellectual liberty—a death-dealing battery against hypocrisy and superstition.

Let Freethinkers therefore stand by it, and assist THE TRUTH SEEKER in placing it in the hands of all who are in search of truth. Let us give the people all the light we can; one little Freethought book costing ten cents, or even less, might be the means of lighting from dark superstition a mind which in return might some day illumine the world. If the Christian church is the "divine" institution which its followers claim, with heaven's code of laws, its rule and guide, and heaven's wisdom pouring in its lap, why is it that it loses in power and influence as people become educated? When this church held the scepter of power, it sought to strangle science while struggling in its cradle. Now, that same church, in order to entertain its congregations, is frequently compelled to teach science itself, in the face of the fact that it formerly treated such an act as a crime punishable by imprisonment, torture, and sometimes death. When did this "divine" church discover that the science of Galileo, Copernicus, Bruno, and others, might with safety be taught in its "divine" pulpits?

In the "blessed age" of the Thumb-screw and Rack, eminent philosophers, scientists, and Freethinkers were thrown to the hogs as it were, while illiterate and cruel Christians were molded into saints. A few years ago the great Evolutionist and Agnostic, Darwin, died in England. What did the Church of England do? did it refuse the "hated Agnostic" the same sepulture as Christians? No; it clasped his remains to its bosom and, with imposing ceremonies, laid them to rest among its "saints" in the sacred vaults of Westminster Abbey. Of course this was not done from any love that church had for the great evolutionist; it simply wanted some good company.

While this stupendous farce was being played, hundreds of England's pauper Christians were being carted to the potter's field. The church has been trying hard to become "well connected" in this country also. Christian historians have claimed ever since the death of Abraham Lincoln, that he was a Christian; yet there is substantial proof that he was not.

Preachers are now claiming that Thomas Jefferson was also a Christian, when everyone knows (even those who make the claim) that Jefferson was an "Infidel." If the church cannot have the support of a celebrated man while living, it comes in and claims him after he is dead. Like the pirate that it is, it wants to add character and standing to itself by plundering the treasure vaults of Freethought and science. The Christians have always had a monopoly of saints, while their philosophers and scientists were few; still they tell us that to Christianity is due the credit of our splendid civilization. This modest claim sounds well, when it is known to all who read history that had it not been for the dog-in-the-manger policy of the Christians the world would have passed eight hundred years ago or more the milestone of progress it has reached to day. Preachers now tell us from their pulpits that the church and science are going "hand in hand." This is very kind on the part of Christianity; it always was kind, especially to science, nevertheless, science refuses to go hand in hand with the church, and not without good reasons. It refuses to extend its stainless hand to its lifelong persecutor. It positively declines the company of a church, the very tolling of whose bells awakens in the heart of every friend of liberty, shuddering memories of commingled blood and tears.

While much remains to be accomplished, we have reasons for believing that our work is, at least, under good headway. The darkest clouds have passed from the horizon of our hope, and the Star of Liberty, our beacon light, is seen beyond the mist. The earth is carpeted with "holy literature," but myth and fable, even clothed in heavenly garb, must perish at the hands of Truth and Science. The siege guns of heaven (the throne and pulpit) are being stripped of man of power which they at one time claimed to come direct from God. The march of truth and science is irresistible. The foe has been driven from his strongest works, and one by one the citadels of superstition crumble. An anxious and admiring world awaits with radiant hope the future fruits of science, whose search-lights girdle earth from sea to sea; in stellar space they leap from sun to sun, and read the story of the peaceful stars.

Kenilworth.

When memory's veil is thrown aside,
And we recall old things anew,
Fate's changeable wheel doth backward glide
To bring past visions to our view;
And Kenilworth's old lofty pile
Presents again the scenes of yore,
When England's Queen in royal style
Reigned over Britain's fateful shore,
And banquets held in halls of state
For revelers mid follies vain,
Pursued the mirage, which grim fate
Could turn from joy to moans of pain,
As pleasures built upon the sands,
Are razed by heart-inflaming brands.

The Inquirendo Club.

IX.—CONTINUED.

"What is the term 'fairy,' signifying a sprite, derived from?" asked Lillie. "It owes its origin to ancient traditions regarding fays, derived from Fate, the goddess of destiny. Fairies, or elves, were supposed to be supernatural beings, generally of human form, but diminutive size."

"Hans Christian Andersen wrote about them, did he not?" asked Ralph.

"His tales were fantastic," was the answer. "But he dwelt more upon allegories than superstitious lore. His work upon 'The Dying Child' is widely circulated, and translated into various languages; a sweet romance where tenderness and pathos is strangely mingled with the weird and supernatural."

"Goethe's 'Faust' is written after that style, is it not?" was the next question.

"Yes, Goethe's Mephistopheles or devil is borrowed from the German legends. It is a masterly work, and is read in all the countries on the globe. Dr. Faustus was a traditional being, celebrated in powers of black art, and had the ability to raise or conjure up the devil, with whom he entered into a contract for twenty-four years, obtaining during that time his fill of earthly pleasure, but forced to surrender up at the end of that time his soul to the great enemy. Goethe only illustrated the legends of his country, but he did so in such a masterly dramatic manner as to make his name famous in all the world's history."

"Who was Guy Fawkes?" asked Arthur.

"Guy Fawkes, properly Guido, was a Catholic and a victim of the Reformed Catholic church. He attempted to blow up the king and his parliament, but was caught, tried, and sentenced. Public opinion was bitterly against him, and they burned him in effigy in several large cities, in London, particularly, where they carried a grotesque figure stuffed with straw through the streets, finally committing it to the flames. In 1600 they were scarcely more barbarous than in 1800, when a sovereign's assassination thrilled the country with horror, and in vengeance they seized upon the hapless murderer, torturing him as they tortured Guy Fawkes."

"What is meant by the Black Rood of Scotland?" asked Ernestine.

"It was an ancient relic belonging to the Scottish kings. Princess Margaret was the one who introduced the emblem, and the Scotch came to regard it with reverence and awe. Many stories were circulated concerning it, and many superstitions originated from it. After the Reformation, however, it disappeared, and the Scotch lost trace of it altogether. It consisted of a cross and chain, the former supposed to have been part of the cross of Calvary's crucified savior."

"Can anyone tell me what was the favorite expression of Hans Christian Andersen?" and before anyone could reply she volunteered the information herself, "Auf Wiedersehn, We hope to meet again. Listen:

O crimson mist of morning sweet!
O beauteous blossoms 'neath our feet!
O light of hope, so deified,
The crown of beauty, glorified!
Sounds so glorious and sublime,

And nature, glorious, serene,

There brightest days unknown to pain,
Will crown our life, auf wiedersehn.

O golden days with shadows fleet!
O promised bliss in colors sweet!
O glorious beauty still denied,
The path of rapture far deserted!
Oh, patience, calm, unmoved, alone,
Still waits upon her barren throne;
Still waits that blithesome, happy day,
When that bleak stone be rolled away;
And the glad'ning sun shines forth again
In our happy dawn, auf wiedersehn.

Whether upon his barren breast,
Growsome winter has sunk to rest;
Or June's sweet odorous colors rolled
On earth's green garments manifold,
Has granted autumn's winds of cold,
Freedom to sweep across the wold;
Or timid spring's sweet gentle reign,
Is herald of pleasure's wanton train,
Still will we smile, despite of pain,
And cherish still, auf wiedersehn.

"Did you write that yourself, Ernie?" asked Florence, and when she laughingly replied in the affirmative, Florence seemed about to speak, when the musical clock softly tolled the hour of four, and the meeting was broken up. IDA BALLOU.

Correspondence.

MIDWAY, KY., Dec. 8, 1894.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: It is such a pleasure to be able to express one's opinions freely and without fear. For unless we are perfectly sincere and honest in what we profess to believe, we take from character its very foundation stone; and under such circumstances we cannot expect to make any marked progress in moral attainment or intellectual worth.

Truth is a thing to be sought; falsehood a thing to be scorned.

George Eliot was once asked her reasons for not accepting Christianity, and she gave what she thought was sufficient answer to cover every mental, moral, and physical ground. The reply was, "Because it is not true."

The wrong that lies in allowing the tenderest, sweetest hopes of the human heart to cluster around a falsehood should be impressed upon the minds of children when they first begin to think, and they will respect their parents all the more when they grow old. Children have the right to know the truth, and it is their parents' duty to tell them the truth. Nothing is so injurious as a lie, no matter how divine it may claim to be. It wounds a child's moral conscience at the very outset.

And what is learnt in childish years
Deep graven on the mind appears
Our whole life's journey through.

The destruction of falsehood is the first step toward ethical culture.

I think that the young boys, readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who are growing to manhood, and are soon to take their places in the Freethought ranks, should become advocates of woman suffrage, and never forsake the cause until masculine domination has ceased to be, for not only will equality make homes happier, but the direction of female energy toward government affairs, instead of missionary meetings, will little by little lower the mercury of church power and hasten the advent of that glorious day when humanity will be the only religion, and prayer and creed a thing of the past.

You asked me to tell you about Freethought in the Blue Grass, but I fear my information on that score would not be very edifying, for few rays of light penetrate the darkness and gloom of orthodox Kentucky; besides, our country is noted for its gambling, horse-racing, and the manufacture of whisky. It has been only a very few months since an Infidel was indicted for "blasphemy."

The one to whom I refer is Mr. C. C. Moore, known as the Infidel editor of the Blue Grass Blade and author of the "Rational View." Mr. Moore is certain of doing his duty, not alone in destroying religious fanaticism, but in contributing what he can toward the construction of a system of ethics and reform that is to wipe out the vice and vanity of modern society, and finally awaken and regenerate all the sons and daughters of men. He is working for those of whom the Nazarene said: "Pray, you who have not sinned, first cast the stone."

The opposition he has encountered in movements of reform only shows how an unbeliever is held in our country; the hatred and contumely dealt out to one who bravely refuses to submit to church authority and knows no guide save the royal banner of truth. Persecution for religion's sake still hardens and deforms the minds of men.

Our minds revert with terror to those poor wretches whom our forefathers tortured with thumbscrew, rack, and piners; to the brave, the noble, and the just who perished in dungeons and burned at stake because they were brave enough to give their honest thoughts. It was not until science began to creep slowly in that persecution grew less intense, for the more secure the foundation of religion, the less brotherly feeling there exists in the hearts of men; and Christendom would do the same to-day if she only had the chance, for she has never ceased to pour out the venom of her tongue against unbelievers ever since Magellan made that magnificent voyage around the world. If I remember aright, it was he who said: "The church says that the earth is flat, but I have seen its shadow on the moon, and I have more confidence in a shadow than in the church."

I wish there were more such spirits to-day. But my letter grows long. With best love for yourself and the children of the Corner, I am sincerely,

MAY L. COLLINS.

THE

BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dived into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

400 Years of Freethought.

From Columbus to Ingersoll

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons have subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might have been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type have reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits have proved the most expensive—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractive—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will give the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called “half-tone” pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

At the Book Table.

“The object of the following essay is to set the principle of animals' rights on a consistent and intelligible footing, to show that this principle underlies the various efforts of humanitarian reformers, and to make a clearance of the comfortable fallacies which the apologists of the present system have industriously accumulated. While not hesitating to speak strongly when occasion demanded, I have tried to avoid the tone of irrelevant re-creation so common in these controversies, and thus to give more unmistakable emphasis to the vital point at issue. We have to decide, not whether the practice of fox-hunting, for example, is more, or less, cruel than vivisection, but whether all practices which inflict unnecessary pain on sentient beings are not incompatible with the higher instincts of humanity.” So writes the Freethinker, Henry S. Salt, in the preface to the excellent little work which we are examining. The author asks—“Have the lower animals ‘rights’?” and he answers—“Undoubtedly—if men have.” This last is the point he wishes to make evident in his first chapter. He does not discuss the abstract theory of natural rights, which is at present looked upon with suspicion and disfavor by many social reformers, since it is often made to cover extravagant and contradictory assertions, but while its phraseology is confessedly “vague and perilous,” there is nevertheless a solid truth underlying it—a truth which has always been clearly apprehended by the moral faculty, however difficult it may be to establish it on an unassailable logical basis. If men have not “rights”—well, they have an unmistakable intimation of something very similar; a sense of justice which marks the boundary-line where acquiescence ceases and resistance begins; a demand for freedom to live their own life, subject to the necessity of respecting the equal freedom of other people.” Herbert Spencer says: “Every man is free to do that which he wills, provided he infringes not the equal liberty of any other man.” Whoever admits that each man must have a certain restricted freedom, asserts that it is right that he should have this restricted freedom, and hence the several particular freedoms deducible may fitly be called, as they commonly are called, his rights.” Mr. Salt is aware that the fitness of this nomenclature is disputed, but until something better is found he will hold, with the author of the Synthetic Philosophy, that men have “rights,” and will contend that the controversy over the term is “little else than an academic battle over words,” and we heartily agree with him. This decision reached, Mr. Salt asks—“If men have rights, have animals their rights also?”

“dominated perhaps by the creed of reincarnation,” included the injunction “not to kill or injure any innocent animal.” But Rome also pleaded for mercy and justice. Its humanitarian philosophers, among whom Seneca and Plutarch and Porphyry were the most conspicuous, took still higher ground in preaching humanity on the broadest principle of universal benevolence. “Since justice is due to rational beings,” wrote Porphyry, “how is it possible to evade the admission that we are bound also to act justly towards the races below us?” But during the supremacy of the church, from the fourth to the sixteenth centuries, little attention was paid to the question of the rights and wrongs of the animal tribes. With the Reformation and the revival of learning, came also a revival of humanitarian feeling, as is indicated by passages in Erasmus and More, Shakespeare and Bacon, “but it was not until the eighteenth century, the age of enlightenment and ‘sensibility,’ of which Voltaire and Rousseau were the spokesmen, that the rights of animals obtained more deliberate recognition. From the great revolution of 1789 dates the period when the world-wide spirit of humanitarianism, which had hitherto been felt by but one man in a million—the thesis of the philosopher or the vision of the poet—began to disclose itself, gradually and dimly at first, as an essential feature of democracy.” In England a great and far-reaching effect was produced by the publication of Paine's “Rights of Man” and Mary Wollstonecraft's “Vindication of the Rights of Woman.” “Looking back now, after the lapse of a hundred years, we can see that a still wider extension of the theory of rights was thenceforth inevitable. In fact, such a claim was anticipated—if only in bitter jest—by a contemporary writer, who furnishes us with a notable instance of how the mockery of one generation may become the reality of the next. There was published anonymously in 1792 a little volume entitled “A Vindication of the Rights of Brutes,” a reductio ad absurdum of Mary Wollstonecraft's essay, written, as the author informs us, “to evince by demonstrative arguments the perfect equality of what is called the irrational species to the human.” The further opinion is expressed that, “after these wonderful productions of Mr. Paine and Mrs. Wollstonecraft such a theory as the present seems to be necessary.” It was necessary; and a very short term of years sufficed to bring it into effect.” Among those who had already spoken for the rights of animals was the Freethinking jurist, Jeremy Bentham. The effect of the works of Thomas Paine and Mary Wollstonecraft forcibly illustrates the truth of Mr. Tucker's aphorism that “all the tyrannies, like all the liberties, stand or fall together.”

Mr. Salt finds that most of the excuses for the cruel treatment of the lower forms of life can be traced back to one of two sources. The first is the religious notion which predicates immortality for man but denies it to other animals. This gives the cruel believer a chance to plead in justification of his atrocities that his victims “have no souls,” a plea often heard in Italy and other countries where cruelty to animals has reached its greatest depth of callousness and gleeful depravity. It is this country—Italy—so long church-cursed—that has given to the world the most cold-blooded of the vivisectioners. Of this religious excuse for cruelty, Mrs. Jameson says: “It should seem as if the primitive Christians, by laying so much stress upon a future life, in contradistinction to this life, and placing the lower creatures out of the pale of hope, placed them at the same time out of the pale of sympathy, and thus laid the foundation for this utter disregard of animals in the light of our fellow-creatures.” The other cause of the indifference of the Western peoples to the sufferings of the animals, is the theory of Descartes and his followers that the lower forms of life are devoid of consciousness and feeling. Animals were declared to be mere “animated machines,” which in no real sense could be said to live at all. Voltaire ridiculed the absurd Cartesian dogma; Schopenhauer characterized it as “a doctrine revolting, gross, and barbarous, peculiar to the West, and having its root in Judaism,” while the scientist George J. Romanes declares that “the theory of animal automatism, which is usually attributed to Descartes, can never be accepted by common sense.” Upon this Mr. Salt comments: “Yet it is to be feared that it has done much, in its time, to harden ‘scientific’ sense against the just complaints of the victims of human arrogance and oppression.” Lecky is quoted as saying that the benevolent affections which embraced at first only the family were gradually extended to include the class, the nation, a coalition of nations, all humanity, and finally its influence is felt in man's dealings with the lower animals. The course of evolution has been from a vague sympathy to a definite recognition of “rights.” “Oppression and cruelty are invariably founded on a lack of imaginative sympathy; . . . when once the sense of affinity is awakened, the knell of tyranny is sounded and the ultimate concession of ‘rights’ is simply a matter of time.” Even such a thinker as Aristotle seriously pondered the question whether a slave could in any sense be considered a man.

Referring to the common plea that suffering is necessary as a “discipline,” our author observes with justifiable causticity that “it is, perhaps, a mere coincidence, but it has been observed that those who are most forward to disallow the rights of others, and to argue that suffering and subjection are the natural lot of all living things, are usually themselves exempt from the operation of this beneficent law, and that the beauty of self-sacrifice is most loudly belauded by those who profit most largely at the expense of their fellow-creatures.” In this class are necessarily included the sportsmen and vivisectioners. In answer to the charge of “sentimentality” made against the friends of animals, Mr. Salt pitifully and justly remarks that the only way to avoid the false sentimentality of the philanthropists on the one hand and the equally false sentimentality of the “men of the world,” whose only regard is for themselves, on the other, is “to take up a consistent position towards the rights of men and of the lower animals alike and to cultivate a broad sense of universal justice (not ‘mercy’) for all living things. Herein, and herein alone, is to be sought the true sanity of temperament.” The rights of animals are not antagonistic to the rights of men. It is a fallacy to suppose that we must study human rights first and leave the other question to be solved hereafter. It is only by a wide and disinterested study of both subjects that a solution of either is possible.

So much in examination of the general law of “rights” in its application to men and to the lower animals. The remaining chapters of the book take up in order the particular applications of the law in a number of cases hereinafter mentioned. Chapter II. deals with the case of the domestic animals; Chapter III. with the case of wild animals; Chapter IV. treats of the slaughter of animals for food; Chapter V. exposes the horrors of sport or amateur butchery; here Mr. Salt aptly says, referring to the “sporting instinct,” that “the sportsman, by force of habit, or by force of hereditary influence, cannot understand or sympathize with the suffering he causes, and being, in the great majority of instances, a man of slow perception, he naturally finds it much easier to follow the hounds than to follow an argument.” Chapter VI. has to do with murderous millinery; Chapter VII. exposes the torture chambers of the scientific experimentalist. In this connection Mr. Salt quotes Miehle as follows: “The child disports himself, shatters, and destroys; he finds his happiness in undoing. And science, in its childhood, does the same. It cannot study unless it kills. The sole use which it makes of a living mind is, in the first place, to dissect it. None carry into scientific pursuits that tender reverence for life which nature rewards by unveiling to us her mysteries.” Chapter VIII. lays down the lines of reform, and in the Appendix we have the bibliography of the rights of animals. In the Second Part of the volume—“Vivisection in America”—Dr. Albert Leffingwell gives the status of the Scientific Inquisition in the United States and tells what our colleges are doing for the humanization of the youth of the land. He also quotes Lawson Tait, one of the most eminent surgeons of Great Britain, as follows: “Like every member of my profession I was brought up in the belief that many of our most valued means of saving life and diminishing suffering had resulted from experiments on the lower animals. I now know that nothing of the sort is true concerning surgery; I do not believe vivisection has helped the surgeon one bit; and I know it often led me astray.” Dr. Leffingwell wields a forceful pen and he does not indulge in hap-hazard statement or useless denunciations. He says that frightful crimes are committed in the name of science, and he amply proves all that he asserts.

Every father and mother, every young man and woman, should carefully read “Animals' Rights.” The questions discussed are among the gravest that confront this and coming generations.

Not for Parsons.

Not long ago, the Rev. Dr. MacGregor, of St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, desiring to pray for the miners, added to the petition in the Litany for "those who travel by land and sea," the words "and for all those whose labor is underground." The good doctor, remembering that the miners were on a strike, after some hesitation, added, "when at work."

AN ORTHODOXIST'S PRAYER. — O sin-tormented King of Souls, who hung abandoned on the Holy Cross, whose dying semblance hangs before my eyes, eternal Victor and Redeemer, merciful Omnipotence, save me, Thy worm, from tolerance! Make me intolerant, O Lord, of what is contrary to Thy Church's law. Make me intolerant of Thy enemies, O sorrow-crowned, abandoned King, crowned now with power! Lord, make me narrow. Narrow my heart that I may wish for nothing outside of my narrow love for Thee. Narrow my thoughts that they may never stray outside Thy narrow truth. Narrow my rule of life that I may never violate Thy narrow ordinance. Narrow my hearing that I may hear nought but Thy still small voice in the narrow searching of my soul. Narrow my sight that I may never see outside Thy narrow way which leadeth unto everlasting life. — C. de Biddle Cope, in "At Century's Ebb."

A GOOD-HEARTED curate, who firmly believed that God was continually working miracles to enable him to help the needy, and who seldom had a coin in his pocket, though he was never devoid of the fire of charity in his heart, was accosted one day by a beggar woman. He pleaded utter lack of money, and sadly turned aside; but on the mendicant beseeching him to search his pockets, he hopelessly put his hand in one and to his amazement and joy, found a five-shilling piece there. "Another of God's miracles!" he exclaimed; and then, addressing the woman, "This coin belongs to you, of right. Take it, and go in peace." Having told the story a few hours later to his worldly-minded parish priest, and suggested that they should both go down on their knees and render thanks to God, a strange, unpleasant light suddenly broke on the mind of the shrewd pastor, who exclaimed in accents not suggestive of thanksgiving: "Good God! Are those my breeches that you've on you?" — Contemporary Review.

MAX O'RELL tells this story about himself. I had just returned to the hotel after having given a lecture on the Scotch at the town hall. I was half undressed when there came a knock at my bedroom door. It was a waiter bearing a card. The Presbyterian minister of the town wished to see me at once on a very urgent matter. I bid the waiter show the reverend gentleman up. A man of about fifty, in the usual black ecclesiastical coat and white cravat, and holding a soft felt hat, appeared in the doorway, wearing a sad face. I recognized him as one of my audience that evening. "Excuse my costume," I began, "but you wished to speak to me on urgent business and I thought best not to make you wait." "There is nothing the matter with your dress," he broke in. "This is not an affair of the body but of the soul. I have come to pray for you." I was taken a little by surprise and felt a trifle disconcerted, but I quickly regained my composure. "Why, certainly," I said, "with the greatest pleasure if it can make you happy." He knelt, put his elbows on the bed, buried his head in his hands and began: "Lord, this man whom thou seest near me is not a sinful man; he is suffering from the evil of the century; he has not been touched by thy grace; he is a stranger, come from a country where religion is turned to ridicule. Grant that his travel through our godly lands may bring him into the narrow way that leads to everlasting life." The prayer, most of which I spare you, lasted at least ten minutes. When he had finished, my visitor rose and held out his hand. I shook it. "And now," said I, "allow me to pray for you." He signified consent by a movement of the hand. I did not go on my knees, but with all the fervor that is in me I cried: "Lord, this man whom thou seest beside me is not a sinful man. Have mercy upon him, for he is a Pharisee, who doubts not for one moment, and that without knowing me, that he is better than I. Thou who hast sent in vain thy son on earth to cast out the Pharisee, let thy grace descend upon this one; teach him that the foremost Christian virtue is charity, and that the greatest charity is that which teaches us that we are no better than our brethren. This man is blinded by pride; convince him, open his eyes, pity him, and forgive him, as I forgive him. Amen." I looked at my good Presbyterian. He was rooted to the floor, amazement written on his face. I once more took his hand and shook it. "And now," said I, "we are quits. Good-night." He went away somewhat abashed, pocketing the mild reproof. — Exchange.

Gems of Thought.

He who loves truth hates the gods, in the singular as well as in the plural.—Schopenhauer.

It is idle to attribute the destruction of superstition to the Reformation. Protestants were as superstitious as Catholics.—H. T. Buckle.

THOUGH pure rectitude may be at present impracticable, it is requisite to know where the right lies, in order that the changes we make may be towards the right instead of away from it.—Herbert Spencer.

OUR moral world is dragged by oxen; it has no railroad speed. The railway carries men's bodies rapidly, but it never interferes with the old slow speed of intellect. The intellect of the church always travels in the oxen's cart.—David Swing.

WHEN a certain quality of religion and a certain quality of law are conjointly utilized in elevating the morals and annihilating the evils of any community, human lives are as bits of chaff between the upper and nether millstones of expediency.—Edgar L. Wakeman.

THERE is something pathetic in the simplicity with which a narrow student will judge the doctrines of a foreign religion by their antagonism or conformity to his own orthodoxy on points where utter difference of opinion exists among the most learned and enlightened scholars.—Taylor.

NATURE knows no anniversaries. Her calendar is not marked with saints' days and her chronology does not date from the birthtime of kings and of saviors. Humanity is a part of nature. Its members are children of the benignant mother. We swing with nature's planets through infinit space, and our origin and destiny, like hers, are rooted not in time but in eternity. Infinity is our present home; eternal is our present life.—Unity.

It would be infinitely better, therefore, if, instead of cramming little brains with "mysteries" which are incomprehensible, and dogmas which are absurd, the child were inspired with a love and a trust in truth, with an enthusiasm for what is good and noble and great. Far better than teaching him aright the details of the "Trinity puzzle" would it be to teach him that no harm can ever come from truth, and no good can ever come from falsehood. If a child be taught thus, he will require no obscurantist theology to make him a good and worthy citizen.—Frederick Ryan.

LUCIFER began, mythologically, as a heavenly detective. He was the lawyer retained by the gods for the suppression of vice; and, from long engaging in that business, he came to love it. When he had nobody to accuse, he was in distress, and went about accusing innocent people. So he was called the accuser. And then he fell lower still, and went about tempting people to sin, in order that he might prosecute them; and then he was called Satan. That was the course of the first Vice Society, and the end of its attorney.—Moncure D. Conway. [And Anthony Comstock began where Satan left off.]

ONE can say without exaggeration that the most religious times and the most religious peoples, or those in which or among whom the power of the church has been the strongest, have, generally speaking, been the most immoral. One has evidence enough in the horrors of the Middle Ages, and if to-day it be otherwise, it is not to religion that we owe the change, but to the spread of education and the progress of intelligence. Experience teaches us that at all times the blackest crimes and the most degraded criminals have been associated with excess of sanctity, and this among peoples generally, as in individuals.—Ludwig Büchner.

THE world is opening both eyes. What does it see? Not only the paltry influences that parade among schoolmen, but great broad streams upon which common men and women are hastened to their enlarging destiny. The church contributes something—as much as could be expected through the thick crust which has nigh crushed out its life. The state, in spite of Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces. A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We have given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We have also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS have been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people have time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we have prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensive; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to give and to have given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to have one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and have it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who have the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps.

Mr. D. Webster Groh, who suggested the formation of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps, has recently been doing some excellent independent work through the Hagerstown (Md.) papers. In New Orleans Erwin Auffurth and S. S. Bryan have made themselves heard to the advantage of the cause through the Times-Democrat, Picayune, and States. Why cannot equally timely and good work be done by local Freethinkers in every city in the Union? The principles of Liberalism could thus be brought to the attention of millions who never see the distinctively Freethought papers. While the clergy and their lay allies are permitted to misrepresent the truth of history and malign the friends of progress in their pulpits and through the press, without contradiction and refutation, we cannot expect that our views will be respected or that they will gain new converts, as they would if we were all vigilant in defense and active in the propagation of what we believe to be true and for the benefit of the world. Would that every reader of THE TRUTH

SEEKER could and would follow the splendid example of Messrs. Groh, Auffurth, and Bryan.

Of course there are some difficulties in the way of such a program, as there are obstacles to the practicalization of the Letter-Writing Corps scheme. Mr. Groh perceives this, and in a late letter to the Captain of the Corps he says: "At the outset I pledged myself to the F. L. W. C., and I find that without the pledge I could hardly compel myself to write as often as I ought. So I think all should be urged to join the F. L. W. C. and pledge themselves both to write to the target and to send in targets whenever they notice a case which would make one, leaving it to you, of course, to decide whether to turn the corps on them or not." Our friend suggests that each Freethinker who approves of this method of work and is willing to help should sign and send to us a pledge something like this:

I hereby pledge myself to write at least one Freethought letter weekly to the target assigned to me in the current issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Name.....
Date..... Residence.....

This pledge would be at once the application for membership in the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps, the promise to write a letter each week, and the certificate of membership.

We here renew our request that all members of the Corps, and all who wish to become such, at once send us their names, with post-office address. To know the size of the Corps is a matter of importance, for it may be necessary to divide it into detachments for work in different places at the same time. This week all members will write to the Atlanta (Georgia) Constitution or the Atlanta Journal in commendation of the stand taken by Rev. Dr. Hawthorne in favor of the taxation of church property and the abolition of chaplaincies, and against the Christianization of the federal Constitution. Let the people of Georgia know that the eyes of the country are upon them and that every step they take in the direction of complete religious liberty will receive the warm applause of freedom-loving men and women in all their sister states. All letters should be brief, clear, to the point, and courteous.

Bible in the Schools in Minnesota.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 3, 1894, we called attention to the fight being made by our subscriber, Mr. S. J. Fleckten, of Kandiyohi, Minnesota, against the reading of the Bible in the public school of his district, No. 61, Kandiyohi county. We quoted from a letter written by the state superintendent of instruction, W. W. Pendergast, to Mr. Fleckten, and also a part of a paragraph from the constitution of the state of Minnesota. Our readers will remember that the superintendent, after stating that his reply to the letter written to him by Mr. Fleckten would follow the lines suggested by the present attorney-general, went on to say that the Bible having been honored by "all intelligent people as a work of the highest literary merit," it would scarcely be improper for the teacher to read selections therefrom to the assembled pupils, and that even children whose parents or guardians do not subscribe to the teachings of the Bible "would hardly receive any harm from such a procedure." He thought that the exercise of common sense and the "toleration for which the United States is noted ought to lead to an amicable understanding among the people of the district, the board of trustees, and the teacher." He suggested that should a patron of the school have conscientious scruples against his children listening to such reading, the trustees and the teacher would perhaps excuse those children from attending the opening exercises. As to the law in the case, he quoted from the opinion of ex-Attorney-General Cole to the effect that, regardless of the character of any book used in the school, the legislature had vested the control of the school in the trustees, and it was entirely within their power to exclude the Bible or to prescribe it as a text-book; there was "no authority competent to revise their action." We disposed of the trivialities of the superintendent, and showed by our quotation from the fundamental law of the state that the reading of the Bible in the public schools is, under any fair and legitimate interpretation of that law, indisputably unconstitutional.

Since the date above mentioned Mr. Fleckten has not let pass an opportunity to manifest his patriotic and just determination to expel the Bible from the school to which he must send his children. He called a meeting of the school board for November 15, and he then read to the board the provisions of the state constitution and explained his position. Thereupon the other patrons of the school called a special meeting of the district electors for December 7, and at that meeting it was resolved that they would sustain the board in the stand it had taken for the reading of the Bible. Thirty members voted to have the Bible read every morning and at least the Lord's Prayer repeated. The meeting unanimously resolved: "This question is hereby settled for the future." Perhaps Mr. Fleckten was formally requested to desist from his attacks upon Bible reading in the school. We notice in the report of the meeting, which we find in the Willmar Argus, that at least two ministers were active in its proceedings, and that a special vote of thanks was tendered to one of them for the "valuable assistance" he had given on that occasion. Comment does not seem to be necessary.

At this meeting a letter from the state superintendent, in reply to some inquiries from a resident of the district, was read. Mr. Pendergast wrote that he would answer the question as to whether Bible reading, without note or comment, ought to be forbidden in the public schools, in case the board and a majority of the patrons want such reading, by inclosing the opinions given on the subject by two former attorney-generals. Inasmuch as these two opinions are flatly contradictory, it looks as though the superintendent realized that he was between two fires and so took the (apparently) easier way out of the difficulty. Gordon E. Cole, who was attorney-general from 1860 to 1866, tries to frighten some one who had objected to Bible reading in the schools by saying that "no man has a right to utter and publish a libel upon the Christian religion (3 Greenleaf on Evidence, Sec. 164), and an officer who should sanction it officially would be guilty not only of moral but of legal crime." We never before saw that "argument" in favor of a sectarian school system. It was in all likelihood original with Mr. Cole, and he should have had it copyrighted. He must have been what our English friends call a "cad." He drags in the French Revolution and talks aimlessly about the "Goddess of Reason," who was said to have been worshiped by some of the revolutionists. The question at issue was not touched by Mr. Cole until near the end of his rambling opinion, where he makes the statement concerning the powers with which the legislature invested the board of trustees which we quoted and commented upon in our November article. Attorney-General Colville, who was Mr. Cole's immediate successor, appears to have read the constitution of his state and, what is more important, to have understood it, for he says:

"When the use of the scriptures in the common school is objected to by the parents or guardians of pupils on account of religious or conscientious scruples, their adoption as a text book is improper and the pupils may decline to use them without being liable to be deprived of the privileges of the school."

This opinion in effect is that the constitution is paramount to the statute and that the board may not force the reading of the Bible in the schools if there is objection on the part of parents or guardians to that reading. This will commend itself to good lawyers as an eminently sound opinion, for only shysters would try to make it appear that the legislature can do what the constitution definitely forbids. That Mr. Colville had the constitution of the state behind him is certain, and that all may understand the status of the question of education in Minnesota, we shall quote here Section 16 of Article 1 of the Bill of Rights. We give it in full that there may be no chance for a quibble embodied in the charge of garbling:

"The enumeration of rights in this constitution shall not be construed to deny or impair others retained by and inherent in the people. The right of every man to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience shall never be infringed, nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any religious or ecclesiastical ministry against his consent, nor shall any control of or interference with the rights of conscience be permitted, or any preference be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship; but liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of the state; nor shall any money be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of any religious societies or religious or theological seminaries."

Section 3 of Article 8 (relating to school funds, education, and science) says, in part:

"But in no case shall the moneys derived as aforesaid or any portion thereof, or any public moneys or property, be appropriated or used for the support of schools wherein the distinctiv doctrines, creeds, or tenets of any particular Christian or other religious sect are promulgated or taught."

The last-quoted inhibition was meant to shut out denominational teachings, presumably, but when interpreted in harmony with Section 16 of the Bill of Rights it will permit of no religious instruction whatever in the public schools. For it is self-evident that it is practically impossible to prevent denominational teachings if the Bible is read in the school, as each teacher will be tempted to read such passages only as appear to sanction the particular dogmas which his denomination accepts. But the inhibitions of the Bill of Rights are amply sufficient to keep the Bible out of the schools of Minnesota if the constitution has any authority with the superintendent and the courts. If the former will not order the trustees to remove the Bible from the school in District 61 of Kandiyohi county; if he insists that the statute compels him to respect the decision of the local board of trustees, then no time should be lost in taking a test case to the supreme court of the state. Look at this matter just a moment in the light of the constitution and of common sense: When the teacher reads the Bible in the morning and repeats the "Lord's Prayer," the schoolhouse, by virtue of that act and that invocation alone, becomes a place of worship, and it is a place of worship for which the Freethinker, S. J. Fleckten, is compelled to help pay—a place of worship which he, as a taxpayer, is forced to support. And yet the Constitution says explicitly that no man shall "be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship." Not only is Mr. Fleckten, in defiance of the fundamental law of the state which he must defend as a loyal citizen, compelled to support a place of worship, but, if there is a compulsory attendance law in Minnesota, his children are actually forced to "attend" a place of religious worship. Still we call this a land of religious liberty! The Bill of Rights also declares that there shall be no interference with the rights of conscience. Mr. Fleckten has conscientious scruples against his children receiving religious instruction in the school which they attend. The board of trustees, the state superintendent of instruction, and the legislature all with one voice tell him that the Constitution's guarantee of liberty of conscience is not worth the paper upon which it is printed. That same Bill of Rights solemnly affirms that no preference shall be "given to any religious establishment or mode of worship," but the legislature has deliberately proceeded to invest every school board in the state with full power to give official preference to Christian modes of worship and sacred books.

Now we come to the question, What is to be done by the Freethinkers of the country and especially by the Freethinkers of Minnesota to help Mr. S. J. Fleckten in this struggle with the powers of sectarianism and theocracy? Is he, a poor man, to be left to fight alone the battle which is the concern of every one of us? We assuredly hope not, but first our comrade should be given an opportunity to speak for himself. He says:

"The fight is growing bigger than I had at first thought that it would, but I am going to fight it out to the end. However, I think that I should have some help. If the Freethinkers in the state of Minnesota would help me to hire a good lawyer and take the case into the courts it would be well. I will donate five dollars and will send you the money when it is decided to take hold of the affair in earnest. If you will act as treasurer and the Freethinkers in the state will send you their contributions, you can employ a lawyer to conduct the suit and carry it to the highest courts if need be. This thing must be nipped in the bud. The longer the Bible-reading practice is continued the harder it will be to break it up, and the more the struggle will cost. I hope you will take this question under consideration. I have notified the school board that I will not send my children to the school so long as it is run as a Christian, sectarian institution. When it again becomes a state, a public, school, they can resume attendance. I told the board that I did not want to pay any more taxes for the support of a sectarian school."

That is a brave stand to take, but it is a perilous one unless he has the united support of the Liberal people of the state of Minnesota, and not of Minnesota alone, but of the whole country. Now that the issue has been sprung there should be no recession. If the Kandiyohi board attempts to punish Mr. Fleckten for his refusal and failure to send his children to school it will at once take the matter into the courts and put us in the way of getting a decision from the highest tribunal of the state. The educational work must be begun immediately. The press and the people of Minnesota must be reached with anti-Bible-in-the-schools arguments and facts. We shall send copies of this number of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the leading journals of the state. That will be merely the initial blow in the preparatory skirmish. Who will be first to add something handsome to Mr. Fleckten's $5?

Great Reductions in Standard Freethought Works.

The popularity of our missionary scheme, by which Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is being scattered broadcast by the thousands, has induced us to lower the price of his other works, with the hope that they too will have a wider reading. From this date the prices of Paine's books will be as follows:

AGE OF REASON. Paper, 25 cents. Eight copies sent to as many different addresses for $1. Cloth, 50 cents.

EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Paper, 15 cents.

COMMON SENSE. The argument that did more than any other to convince the Revolutionary leaders of the necessity of the separation of this country from Great Britain. Paper, 15 cents.

THE CRISIS. Paine's great Revolutionary writings. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Answer to Burke's attack on the French Revolution. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PAINE'S GREAT WORKS IN ONE VOLUME. 8vo., 800 pp., cloth, $3, leather $4, morocco, gilt edges, $4.50. This book and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $5.

We hope all our readers will do their best to scatter these splendid works all over the country.

A political party in Philadelphia has nominated Ex-Governor Robert E. Pattison for mayor. This man is recognized by Freethinkers and Christians alike as one of the most bigoted Sabbatarians in Pennsylvania, which is saying a great deal. While he was governor he stood like a rock in opposition to any reform of the exceptionally severe Sunday laws of that state. The Liberals of Philadelphia can find no better man to vote against than Robert E. Pattison. He is hand and glove with the National Reformers and the Sabbath Unions of the state and can, if he is elected mayor, be depended upon to do all that lies within his power to give the city a Puritan government. Forewarned is forearmed.

We wish our readers would look at the date on their wrappers and see if they do not owe us a renewal. If they find they do, it will be a great favor to us if they will forward it at their earliest convenience, as we need the money. Owing to various causes, more than the usual number are in arrears at present, and this embarrasses us financially, or we wouldn't mention it. We like to keep square with the world, and in order that we may do this it is necessary that our readers keep square with us, for when they let their subscriptions run behind we have to get behind with others. We have no capital to fall back upon, and depend upon getting our dues to give others their due. If our friends who are in arrears will note these facts and act thereupon, it will be, as we have said, a great favor to us, and a favor duly and thankfully appreciated.

Rev. Fr. Stick, of Pana, Illinois, is, according to a summary of a sermon of his which we find in the Detroit News, a gentleman of almost boundless charity of thought and inexpressible tenderness of heart, and he clothes his profound ideas in language of the most exquisite delicacy. For instance, he said that he wished that those who spent their money for drink, instead of taking pews in his church, would get drunk, lie outdoors all night, and freeze to death. He hoped that the girls who went to balls and dances, no matter how high-toned, would be ruined, and every boy and young man would become diseased and rot. As the News remarks, "there is nothing halfway about these people who, whether lay or clerical, express their good wishes toward their fellow men. They evidently do not wish to be misunderstood, either." If Mr. Stick has been correctly reported we should imagine that he has very poor-spirited parishioners if he does not soon get his dismissal. "Moral" orthodoxy is fully as savage and intolerant as religious orthodoxy, and it is rapidly taking the place of the latter as the dominant force in government.

The Christian Statesman, speaking of the introduction of automatic voting machines to prevent fraud at elections, observes that since there does not seem to be any other way to secure an honest vote and fair count, it may be well to give the machines a trial. But it points out that the innovation does not go very far as a reformatory device. "It does not introduce morals into politics. It will not secure the nomination of good men." This is precisely the trouble with the scheme for the Christianization of the Constitution. Instead of making politics less immoral it would increase the immorality by putting a premium on hypocrisy, and thus instead of securing the nomination of better men than at present head the various parties it would inevitably lower the moral standard of our politicians by giving all the best places either to sincere fanatics of the narrowest type or to unscrupulous unbelievers and indifferents posing as fanatics. Men are made moral neither by voting machines nor Christian amendments to the Constitution. But while voting machines would have a certain value in that they would take away from the tricky voter and ward-heeler some of their opportunities to cheat, the Christianization of the Constitution and laws would immeasurably increase the desire and the chances to deceive and rob the people. The Statesman adds:

"If men have no conscience in political matters it may be well, while the work of true reform is incomplete, to introduce some kind of machinery to take the place of conscience."

That, presumably, is the purpose of Sunday laws—they are designed to take the place of a conscientious conviction that Sunday should be observed as a day of rest and worship—the only object of the rest being to give an opportunity for worship. The Sunday law is a legal machine designed to act as a substitute for character.

The fall and winter being more particularly the reading season, and naturally the renewing of subscription season, we hope that our friends will make a little effort to send THE TRUTH SEEKER some new subscribers. A good many of our old ones have had to drop off during the past eighteen months of panic and dullness in the business world, and we need some more to take their places and push on the work. Our friends have never failed us in an emergency, and we again venture to ask them to do something to help by inducing new subscriptions. We have tried to make this easy by the premium offers printed on the second page of this paper, and we think considerable can be done by our friends if they will take the trouble to speak a good word for us to their Liberal acquaintances.

To those who feel like presenting THE TRUTH SEEKER for a short time to some dear friend, our Trial Subscription offer opens the way at a small cost. A great many of the Liberals to whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is first sent this way become permanent subscribers and earnest workers in the cause of mental liberty.

And lastly, after you have induced some acquaintance to subscribe, and sent THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to some friend, send us the names of all the Liberals you know, and we will send them sample copies, and see if they, too, will not subscribe. We need them all.

How completely New York is under the thumb of the various amateur semi-ecclesiastical, semi-spoils societies was shown again last week by a little incident in connection with the regular nightly entertainment of the new Manhattan Athletic Club. The performance is a private one for the amusement of the members of the Club and invited guests. Others have no more right to intrude there than they would have to enter a man's residence without his permission. But such a trifling thing as that is no obstacle to the volunteer governors of the city. So, on the evening of January 16, one Gormley, an agent of the Gerry society, forced his way in by the protesting doorkeepers and took a seat. It seems that four girls, the Goldsmith sisters, have sometimes appeared in the performance. They are under sixteen years of age, and do a song and dance. They were the persons that Gormley went there to "protect"! Manager Genslinger of the Club asked the interloper to leave. He refused. Then a policeman was sent for and he was arrested. The next day Ex-Postmaster Van Cott, president of the Club, appeared in Yorkville police court to prosecute him, but when he learned who the meddler was he got down in the dust of apology and withdrew the charge, and Gormley went his way triumphant, having evidently exacted a promise from Mr. Van Cott that the orders of the Gerry combination should in future be obeyed, for the Goldsmith sisters did not appear that night. There are a large number of super-serviceable "reformers" who want the laws of the entire country to partake of the spirit and be framed on the model of those of the Gerry society and its congeners. These people are being flattered and fawned upon by the Comstocks, McAfees, Gerrys, Brittons, Mrs.

Martins, and the rest of that genus, and there is serious danger that they will fail to perceive that such sickening adulation is proof positive that they, the "reformers," are on the inclined plane of reaction that leads Avernusward. The descent is very easy, and it is also swift and fatal.

Josiah W. Leeds, the Quaker National Reformer of Philadelphia, has lately been trying to induce the bill-posters of Pennsylvania, in state convention assembled, to take a stand against what he is pleased to call indecent show bills. He and the secretary of the association had considerable correspondence on the subject, in which Mr. Leeds indulged in the customary cant concerning the exposure of the unclothed human body. He threatened that if the bill-posters did not voluntarily refuse to do the work assigned to them by the theaters and other houses of entertainment the law-making power would be invoked to compel them to bow to the will of the anti-naturalists. But it is with an admission of the advocate of suppression that we are at this moment concerned. Replying to some of the semi-defensive arguments of the secretary of the bill-posters' association, Mr. Leeds says:

"As to the third point, that a boy may become so accustomed to seeing nude pictures around him as to think no evil upon the matter unless it be pointed out to him, such agrees to a certain extent with my own sentiment and observation of the subject."

If this is so—and it undoubtedly is—does it not follow that the crusaders against the nude in art, by calling the attention of the young to the alleged evil in the pictorial representations of the human form, directly and inevitably plant unhealthful thoughts in the receptive minds of the children? Every person of culture who has thought seriously on this subject in the light of the experience of the peoples who have been free from the absurd Christian fear of the nude must admit that sexual impurity is not, to put it very mildly, any greater in those countries where partial or complete nudity is customary than in Christian nations and among other peoples who insist upon the essential viciousness of the unclothed figure. As a matter of fact, the teaching of the church regarding the human body has been productive of a phenomenal amount of vice and disease. Christians, like Mr. Leeds, under the influence of the debauched and poisonous fancies of the desert mystics and ascetics, are continually "pointing out" to our children "indecent and obscenity" where none exist, and they are responsible for a large part of the real indecency and vice that curse the people. It would be just as rational to "point out" to boys and girls the nudity of animals and flowers and insist that these should be clothed as it is to pursue the course regarding human nudity that they seem to think it their duty to do, and which makes them a nuisance to all right-thinking men and women and the propagators of the very evils they are trying to eliminate.

The Chicago Journal, which many years ago received and merited the title of "The Old Reliable," because of its chronic habit of repeating its Munchausenisms, is very much worried about the introduction of individual communion cups. Its present editor is a patriot imported from Nova Scotia. He made a failure of his attempt to run the American in Chicago, but subsequently obtained control of the Journal. His professions of devotion to the institutions of this country are numerous and fervid, but we are credibly informed that he nevertheless has strong monarchical "leanings," and favors a union of church and state, provided that the church is of the "Established" persuasion. To come directly to the question of individual communion cups, it appears that Mr. Thompson is afraid that their introduction into the churches will fan the flame of Infidelity. He says that the talk concerning the advisability of providing them is "a severe shock to the devout Christian who still believes that the bread and wine are the body and blood of the Savior and who eats and drinks in remembrance that Christ died for him." This devout Christian does not understand, we are gravely informed, why it is that the God who, he has been taught, keeps watch over the sparrows should be thought to neglect the communion cup and permit the deadly bacteria to find lodgment therein.

"He cannot force himself to admit, no matter what science may tell him, that the liquor that gives him spiritual health may also give him physical disease. He has faith that God will protect him from the microbes while he is at God's table."

This childish faith is likely to be chilled, Mr. Slason H. Thompson thinks, if the preachers do not quit throwing doubts on the goodness or power of God by taking purely human precautions against microbes at the communion table. These preachers seem, to "the devout Christian," "to have lost their faith and cut away from all their anchors. It is all very bewildering." But the closing paragraph of the editorial under review is the climax of theological absurdity and immoral cant:

"If disease lurks in the communion cup, the Infidels will argue, that is sufficient proof that the ceremony is a meaningless form which might just as well be abandoned. This argument, the ministers must see, would be a very serious thing for Christianity, for, though it prove nothing, it yet would have a powerful effect upon the unthinking. It is better that a thousand communicants should get diphtheria (say) than that a hundred thousand should be forced into incredulity."

This is an echo from the ages of darkness, when the Inquisitors argued that it were better that millions should die under torture, on the rack and at the stake, than that the safety of the souls of hundreds of millions should be imperiled by the teaching of heresies. Mr. Thompson would have been a model Torquemada had he lived a few centuries ago. He would cheerfully have sacrificed men's bodies that he might save their souls. The doctrine of exclusive salvation is an exalted "ideal" indeed!

Justice to Paine.

The publication of Conway's "Life of Paine" and the new edition of Paine's works is calling out encomiums on the great antagonist of priestcraft from the most unexpected quarters. The Rev. Samuel M. Jackson, editor-in-chief of the "Concise Dictionary of Religious Knowledge," says:

"The time has come for justice to be done to Thomas Paine. That he has been dreadfully slandered should be frankly admitted. The religious public, which has hounded his memory and racks its brains to find epithets picturesque enough to describe his alleged fate, should make confession that it did these things ignorantly. Mr. Conway has done much to hasten the revolution of sentiment which has been silently taking place for some time back. Witness Mr. John Habberton's article upon Thomas Paine in Appleton's 'Dictionary of American Biography.' Ten years ago I wrote the article upon him in the 'Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia,' after reading all the biographies of Paine mentioned in the literature appended to the article."

Paine was through life singularly generous, unselfish, and affectionate. He held his views tenaciously and defended them valiantly; but he treated his enemies mercifully when he had it in his power to injure them, and he won golden opinions from the many whom he had befriended. His splendid courage in trying to save the life of Louis XVI. was only a specimen of what he could do, and his prior services in the cause of American freedom entitle him to deathless fame. It is plain as anything could be that if he had not published the 'Age of Reason,' he would to-day be in the National Walhalla by the side of Washington; and yet that book in its audacity and its bravery was evidence of the devotion he all along evinced to what he considered the best interests of man. It was Paine's greatest achievement. It is a masterpiece. Strange that he should have been called an Atheist. Why, his theology is the most naïve Deism; and the book has outlived all its attacks and is still circulated as unanswerable."—Independent Pulpit.

The Secret Thrift of Thomas Paine.

In the second part of the "Rights of Man," Paine says:

At an early period, little more than sixteen years of age, raw and adventurous, and heated with the false heroism of a master who had served in a man-of-war, I began the carver of my own fortune, and entered on board the Terrible, privateer, Captain Death. From this adventure I was happily prevented by the affectionate and moral remonstrance of a good father, who, from his own habits of life, being of the Quaker profession, must have begun to look upon me as lost. But the impression, much as it effected at the time, began to wear away, and I entered afterwards in the King of Prussia, privateer, Captain Mendez, and went with him to sea.

Why did Paine say he was "happily prevented" from the first adventure? The Terrible was captured in less than four years. Did Paine serve at all on that privateer? Sherwin, one of his best biographers, supposes that he did a short time. And Paine, in "Common Sense," tells us that the Terrible, with upwards of two hundred men and less than twenty sailors, stood the hottest engagement of any ship during the war with France.

All we know of Paine's life from the age of sixteen to twenty years is that he was at sea and probably became a captain; for, if his biographer Oldys is to be believed, Paine looked "a dozen years older than he was," and "such was his enterprise on the water, and his intrepidity on the ice, that he became known by the appellation of commodore." But whether he became a captain of a privateer or served only as a subordinate, he probably quit the service with a considerable share of prize-money.

Now, secretiveness was excessive in Paine, and he tells us that his religion was to do good. Indeed, "the Religion of Humanity" was first enunciated by him. What would such a man do with a small fortune obtained by piracy? His secretiveness would forbid him to let it be known that he had it, and his philanthropy would cause him to do good with it.

Quitting the sea, Paine goes to work in London at staymaking, and there abides nearly two years. But his spare time is spent in study; he purchases a pair of globes and attends philosophical lectures. Then he goes to Dover, then to Sandwich, where he marries an orphan waiting-woman. She lives only a year. Then Paine quits staymaking and prepares himself for the office of exciseman. He is 23 years of age. He spends some months in London, and goes thence to his birthplace, Thetford, all the time continuing his studies.

Four years after quitting staymaking he is appointed exciseman. He is set to watch smugglers at Alford. His salary is only £50 a year, and when he pounces upon a party of smugglers it is at the risk of his life.

After one year's service he is dismissed. A year later he applies for reinstatement and is ordered to be restored on a proper vacancy. But that does not come until nearly two years have elapsed. Meanwhile he finds employment for a few months in London as an assistant teacher, at a small salary.

In the spring of 1768, at the age of 31, he is an exciseman at Lewes, forty-five miles south of London. His abode is with Samuel Ollive, a tobacconist. The best room in the house is assigned to him, and as late as 1840, on the walls of that room, was to be seen the inscription, "Tom Paine's Study."

His service at Lewes lasted six years. It did not require half his time; the other half was spent in London. Two years before quitting Lewes he wrote a petition to Parliament on behalf of the poorly paid excisemen. The writer's name did not appear, and four thousand copies were printed for the use of the officers. I call particular attention to the following passage in that paper:

Poverty, in defiance of principle, begets a degree of meanness that will stoop to almost anything. A thousand refinements of argument may be brought to prove that the practice of honesty will be the same in the most trying and necessitous circumstances. He who was never an hungry may argue finely on the subjection of his appetite, and he who was never distressed may harangue as beautifully on the power of principle. But poverty, like grief, has an incurable deafness; the oration loses its edge and the "To be or not to be" becomes the only question.

Now I deny, a priori and a posteriori, that the anonymous writer of that passage was describing his own case.

It is true that his known resources were not enough to support him economically. From the time he quit staymaking until his last discharge from the excise office, a period of fourteen years, his apparent resources were his meager salary as exciseman for seven years and as assistant teacher for a few months, aggregating not more than £400. Without considerable further means he must have been distressingly poor.

Again, for the thirteen succeeding years, from 1774 to 1787, when he embarked for France, his compensation for less than three years' public service was certainly not more than barely enough to support him those three years, and yet he was able to subscribe $500 for the relief of General Washington's distressed army.

By what means he supported himself during the unemployed years from 1760 to 1787—sixteen or seventeen out of the twenty-seven—we do not know. But we do know that he was never a beggar, never even a beneficiary, never unable to pay for what he got, never involved in debt, often a helper of others in distress, and that he always declined to receive the profits on his literary work.

Before his departure from America, in 1787, he received from the state of Pennsylvania £500 as compensation for his services during the war.

The Continental Congress also voted him $3,000 for the same services; but the resolution did not carry an appropriation, nor was there any way to pay the money without calling on the states for it. And even if it could have been paid by Congress Paine could not have accepted it, because the resolution was so worded as to make the award for his "ingenious and timely publications," and Paine in his petition to Congress in 1808 says in regard to those publications, "as they were works done from principle, I cannot dishonor that principle by asking a reward for them." And in a letter to President Jefferson in 1805 he says:

I have been a volunteer to the world for thirty years without taking profits from anything I have published in America or Europe.

This was written at a time when Paine was supporting Madam Bonneville and her two sons, which was a heavy tax on his limited means. In his petition to Congress in 1808 he says he has found it necessary to sell a part of his farm, and that none of the states but New York and Pennsylvania ever made him the least acknowledgment for his services during the war, a part of which was going to France in 1781 and helping to obtain six million livres as a present and ten million as a loan. "As I have never had a cent for this service," says he, "I feel myself entitled, as the country is now in a state of prosperity, to state the case to Congress." And in the same petition Paine says with regard to the old resolution to pay him $3,000: "Congress could do no more than recommend, of which the states frequently took no notice."

For the next fifteen years of Paine's life, 1787 to 1802, spent chiefly in France, his only apparent resources were whatever pay he may have received as a member of the National Convention, and as private secretary to Minister Monroe for about a year.

His farm at New Rochelle, donated as a confiscated estate by the state of New York, became valuable, but never yielded him an income.

During his last years in Paris his abode was with the family of Bonneville. When he returned to America in 1802 he sent for them to come to this country. The father could not quit France, but Madam Bonneville and her two little sons accepted the invitation. They were impoverished, and Paine not only supported them for the remaining seven years of his life, but bequeathed to them most of his estate, valued at about $30,000.

From all I can gather in regard to Paine's condition from 1760 until he received the £500 from the state of Pennsylvania, his known or apparent resources were not half enough to support him economically. I do not wonder, therefore, that all his biographers have represented him as distressingly poor. But they were all mistaken. None of them has undertaken to explain the paradox of a very poor man steadfastly refusing to accept the profits on his literary work. Why should the author of "Common Sense," the copyright of which was donated to the Colonies and yielded great profit, have suffered abject poverty as late as the close of the Revolutionary war? Mr. Conway tells us that while General Washington, in September, 1783, the month of final peace, was having a merry time at Princeton, dining with members of Congress there assembled, all drinking wine out of silver cups, "Paine sat in his little home at Bordentown living on his crust" I deny that he was ever so poor as that.

And now to support my postulate, that from the time he quit the sea until the close of the American war he was never without means adequate to his wants, I adduce the case of Junius, who, beyond the shadow of a doubt, was Thomas Paine, the lowly exciseman.

I turn to "Miscellaneous Letters of Junius," No. XXXII., dated Aug. 19, 1768. It is the first of three signed "Atticus." The writer says:

The greatest part of my property having been invested in the funds, I could not help paying some attention to rumors or events by which my fortune may be affected; yet I never lay in wait to take advantage of sudden fluctuation, much less would I make myself a bubble to bulls and bears, or a dupe to the pernicious arts practiced in the alley. . . . A letter which appeared some days ago in the Public Advertiser revived many serious reflections of this sort in my mind, because it seemed to be written with candor and judgment. The effect of these reflections was that I did not hesitate to alter the situation of my property. I owe my thanks to that writer that I am safely landed from a troubled ocean of fear and anxiety, on which I think I never will venture my fortunes and my happiness again.

The next letter signed "Atticus" is No. XLV., dated Oct. 6, 1768. From it I quote the following:

In my last letter I foretold the great fall of the stocks which has since happened, and I now do not scruple to foretell that they must and will fall much lower.

The chief reasons given by the writer for a further depression of the funds were a prospect of war with France, the hostile temper of the Colonies, the oppressive debt, and, above all, the misery, weakness, and distraction of the interior government. In regard to the Colonies, Atticus feared that they might become "an independent people," opening trade with the rest of the world, in which case England would be undone. To avoid this he hoped the administration would yield some ground to the pretensions of the Colonies and agree upon certain conditions which would be acceptable to the reasonable part of the American people. In conclusion the writer says:

But it is impossible for an honest man to behold the circumstances to which a weak, distracted administration has reduced us, without feeling a pang at least for the approaching ruin of Great Britain.

For two years before the first of the Junius series of letters appeared, the same writer, under various other signatures in the Public Advertiser, had caused much sensation. And if there could be any doubt that Atticus was Junius, it is now entirely dispelled by the publication of several private letters addressed to ex-Premier Grenville in 1768, in one of which the writer inclosed a reprint of a letter by Atticus avowing himself to be the author. And those private letters to Grenville were signed "C," which was the constant signature of Junius in his private letters to the printer of the Public Advertiser.

There are no land records kept in England whereby it would appear that in the summer of 1768 Thomas Paine became the owner of real estate. Nor can the records of the transfer of consols be procured without an order of a court of law.

Was that real estate located in London? Probably it was. In 1766 and 1767 Paine resided there. Early in 1768 he became an exciseman at Lewes, but spent much of his time in London. Mrs. Olivia Wilmot Serres, in her attempt to prove that her uncle, Dr. Wilmot, was Junius, says that in 1769 he frequently resided at the house of his brother-in-law Captain Payne, with whom an American named Fretland was on terms of intimacy. Fretland had concerns in the West Indies and frequently sent Dr. Wilmot various productions of that climate. Her uncle Wilmot had a servant named Middleton, and Captain Payne had a wife, spoken of indifferently by the name of Olivia and Olive, suggestive of Miss Ollive, who was married to Paine in 1771. Now Junius, in a private letter to the printer, dated July 15, 1769, says: "Direct a letter to Mr. Middleton, to be left at the bar of the New Exchange Coffee-house." And in another private letter, Jan. 2, 1771, he says: "Change the direction to Mr. John Fretley."

Mrs. Serres wrote her book in 1813, forty-four years after the events she recorded. If her statement be true, that her uncle was a brother-in-law of Captain Payne, I infer that it was by marrying either Paine's sister or a sister of his deceased wife. For Paine was a widower in 1769, and did not marry again until March, 1771.

Is not this fragment of external evidence, coupled with the internal proof that Paine was Junius, sufficient to cause the belief that in August, 1768, Paine became the owner of a house in London, where he spent a portion of his time while writing the letters of Junius?

And now, having demonstrated the secret thrift of Thomas Paine, who can fail to appreciate the nobility of character displayed by Junius in declining the offer of the publisher, Woodfall, to share with him the profits on the authorized edition? "As for myself," said Junius, "be assured that I am far above all pecuniary views, and no other person, I think, has a claim to share with you. Make the most of it, therefore, and let all your views in life be directed to a solid, however moderate, independence. Without it no man can be happy, nor even honest."

W. H. Burr.

If you suffer your people to be ill educated, and their manners to be corrupted from their infancy, and then punish them for those crimes to which their first education disposed them, what else is to be concluded from this but that you first make thieves and then punish them?—Sir Thomas More in "Utopia."

Freethought and Secular Notes from England.

WOMEN GUARDIANS.

Personally I am delighted at every advance woman makes towards securing her proper share in local government. It is, therefore, a pleasure to me to see from the current number of the Co-operative News that the Women's Co-operative Guild have played their part right well in the recent elections for guardians. The guild, it must be premised, consists almost entirely of working women who are associated for various purposes, industrial, social, and civic, and it is one of the most strenuous and democratic of organizations. Out of thirteen members who stood as candidates for the guardians and who were supported in their respective localities by the full strength of the district branch, eight were returned, three at the head of the poll and three second on the list for their parishes.

Among the towns in England which can now boast of co-operative women guardians are Burnley, Darwen, Derby, Leeds, Lincoln, and Nelson. These results are encouraging, and they show what can be done where there is the right spirit and a vigorous organization to give women a voice in civic affairs.

THE NEW SCHOOL BOARD.

The theological status of the new School Board differs very little from the old one. The clerical party has still a small majority; and no doubt there will be again much time wasted and ill feeling manifested in discussing the religious difficulty. Lord George Hamilton has succeeded Mr. Diggle as chairman of the Board. This change, however, in my opinion, will not, to any great extent, affect the decision of the Board upon the question of the religious instruction that will be forced upon the children. The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER have been already informed that I failed at the recent election to win a seat. The odds against me were too great, but the cause of secular education was certainly benefited by my candidature. The absurdity of people calling themselves "Progressives" who wished to adhere to a sham compromise made in 1871 was clearly shown. And the fact that I received in the division of Finsbury, which is the very hotbed of orthodoxy, 7,642 votes, and this in the face of the determined silence of the press as to my candidature, shows that the principle of secular education is gaining in public favor. Moreover, not only had I the opinion of Mr. Gladstone and the Rev. Dr. Parker on my side upon this question, but the general secular vote has increased in three years from 21,352 to 72,074. Like all great reforms the exclusion of the Bible and theology from our public schools must be the work of time. The battle for the emancipation of the young from the snares of priestcraft has begun, and it shall be fought out to the end. Three more years of earnest propagandist work will doubtless produce further marvelous results.

SECULAR PROGRESS.

Christians are not only rapidly giving up the belief in doctrines that were once regarded as essential to their faith, but now they are withdrawing their opposition to secular amusements. In the Christian World of the 27th of last month, the editor boldly defends card-playing, dancing, and attendance at theaters. He says:

It is discovered that the hard and fast lines of the old days were very blunderingly drawn, and are really useless and mischievous as boundaries of conduct. And this because they represented no rational principles. It is seen, for instance, that to taboo cards as a source of endless innocent games because they have been abused as instruments of gambling is about as logical as to suppress the printing press because it is sometimes used to disseminate betting intelligence. In like manner it is recognized that no moral difference exists per se between people dancing together, and their walking, or riding, or running together. Any one of these pursuits may be turned to evil purposes if evil thoughts are carried into it. As to the theater, the dramatic instinct has at last fairly established its right to exist and to play its part in promoting human enjoyment and instruction.

The chains of orthodoxy are indeed falling fast from professed Christians of the present generation.

RELIGIOUS IMMORALITY.

In the same issue of this Christian paper the editor writes an article under the above heading which is anything but complimentary to the church. He says:

Every one will, we suppose, admit that truthfulness, sincerity, intellectual honesty are among the foundation elements of morality. Yet not less certain is it than humiliating that one of the chief functions of the chief religious institution of this land is the holding out to various classes of men of inducements of every kind to intellectual dishonesty.

Then, after indicating wherein certain professors of Christianity are insincere and open to various kinds of bribery, the writer concludes as follows:

The condition of things we have thus sketched is not pleasant to contemplate, but it is time the English people fairly faced it. It is time they asked themselves how long the representative religious system of the country shall continue to be one which offers bribes to intellectual insincerity. Meanwhile the Nemesis which in human affairs judges and condemns all deviation from the true and the right, is visibly at work in this region of things. Its presence is shown in the fact that the best mind of the country is refusing the church's bribe, dazzling though it be. Here are some eloquent figures: Whereas fifty years ago at Cambridge only five out of twenty-four professors were laymen, there are now, outside the divinity professorships, forty professors at Cambridge and forty-eight at Oxford, only three of whom in each case are clergy. And whereas in 1843 ninety Fellows of the Royal Society were in Orders there are now only sixteen. In other words, the intellect of the country, its leaders in science, learning, and literature, are no longer in the clerical ranks.

These facts have long been known to Freethinkers, but their corroboration, coming direct from a Christian source, is of significant importance.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

Under the able directorship of its president, Mr. G. W. Foote, the National Secular Society is still making marked progress. During the past years its membership has considerably increased and its propaganda has extended. My audiences and those of Mr. Foote, both in London and throughout the provinces, are all that could be desired, alike in numbers and in enthusiasm. Mr. A. B. Moss, Mr. Heafold, C. Cohen, and others, are also actively engaged in the lecturing field, and a large and effective staff of open-air speakers are doing good work in the advocacy of Freethought principles. The executive of the National Secular Society are occupied at present in making extensive and important improvements at our headquarters in London. Our Freethought friends on the American continent may be pleased to know that the Secular movement in England is still in the progressive stage.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

The Rationalist Press Committee continues its free circulation of Agnostic literature, and The Truth Seeker, published in Bradford, Yorkshire, maintains its reputation and circulation.

Our friend Putnam's admirable book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," is much appreciated by those who have seen it. Unfortunately its price will limit its sale here, for but few men in England at the present time have $5 to spare for anything but absolute necessities. Colonel Ingersoll's new lecture on the Bible, which Mr. Foote has published, is selling rapidly.

CHARLES WATTS.

How the Sun Stood Still the Second Time.

It is not, I think, generally known that Joshua's miracle was repeated at the capture of Oran by the Spaniards under Cardinal Ximenes, May 17, 1509. "To accommodate the Christians, as the day was far advanced when the action began, the sun was permitted to stand still for several hours—most authorities make it four. There is no miracle in the whole (Roman Catholic) budget better vouched than this. It is recorded by four eye-witnesses—men of learning and character. It is attested, moreover, by a cloud of witnesses, who depose to have received it, some from tradition, others from direct communication with their ancestors present in the action, and who all agree that it was a matter of public notoriety and belief at the time" (Prescott, "Ferdinand and Isabella," vol. iii., p. 272). The shallow objection noticed by Prescott that "so astounding a miracle could not have escaped the notice of all Europe, where it must have been as apparent as at Oran," might equally be alleged against the miraculous darkness during Christ's passion, which, though it extended "over all the earth" (Luke xxiii, 44, 45), is mentioned only by the evangelists. If we believe that the sun stood still at Gibeon on the authority of Jasher, who lived at least five hundred years later (2 Sam. i, 18), surely we must believe that the sun stood still upon Oran on the evidence of four eye-witnesses, etc.

A further proof of the second miracle having been wrought by the same divine author is that the object of both was the same—that his people might be "avenged upon their enemies." The Israelites spent the prolonged daylight in butchering the Canaanites. The Spaniards did likewise when they stormed Oran by the light of the stationary sun. "Most of the Moors fled into the houses and mosques for protection; but resistance and flight were alike unavailing. No mercy was shown—no respect for age or sex; and the soldiery abandoned themselves to all the brutal license and ferocity which seem to stain religious wars above every other. It was in vain Navarro [Ximenes's lieutenant, more merciful than Joshua] called them off. They returned like bloodhounds to the slaughter, till at last, wearied with butchery, and gorged with the food and wine found in the houses, they sunk down to sleep promiscuously in the streets and public squares. The sun [it at length "moved on"], which on the preceding morning had shed its rays on Oran, flourishing in all the pride of commercial opulence, and teeming with a free and industrious population, next rose on a captive city, with its ferocious conquerors stretched in slumber on the heaps of slaughtered victims" (Prescott).

Let the Infidel tremble. God's wonders and God's people are the same in every age and land.

JAMES A. RICHARDSON, in the Freethinker.

A Freethinker's Benefactions.

It will be noticed that James Lick gave nothing for mere charity. He did not believe in relieving any human being able to work from the necessity of earning his bread. Lick gave to science and educational improvement, to public necessity, and to art. He did not seek to set up a rival to any existing state institution. He did not duplicate anything. What he sought were new avenues by which mankind might be benefited without injury to themselves or posterity. The only eleemosynary institution which he founded was the Home for Old Ladies. For that, blessings will be showered on his name through the long centuries. His great telescope on Mount Hamilton has already made the retiring miller of the early days a name and fame as wide as the civilized world. The human sentiment appeared in honor of his liberal endowment of the Pioneers. The Academy of Natural Sciences early attracted his attention as an institution from which great things might be expected, and it shared liberally in his benefactions.

The School of Mechanic Arts just opened cannot fail to do a great deal of good in its time. This simple patriotism of the man found expression in the statue of Key in the park; his love of the state in the historic group which has recently been set up in front of the City Hall. One other institution he founded, and that is the free baths on Tenth street, for some time in operation. No man could have given more liberally, for he gave all that he had. The deep love of humanity which is apparent in all secures for him a place among the benefactors of mankind second to none.—San Francisco Bulletin.

[The Bulletin should not have omitted James Lick's noble gift to Paine Memorial Building, Boston.]

How "Sabbath" Laws Make Liars.

From Tiberias to the hot baths on the shore southward is farther than it is permitted to the pious Jew to walk from his house on the Sabbath. One Sabbath I found an old man who had just returned from the baths, and asked him how he had ventured to break the Sabbath law. He replied, triumphantly, that he had not broken it, and pointed out that a man's "house" is defined as the place where he has eaten bread. Now it would be a breach of the law to carry bread on the Sabbath. To get over this difficulty, on the previous evening, when going to the baths, he concealed a piece of bread among the ruins about half-way. Returning, he unearthed it, thankfully ate it, and then, from this artificial "house," it was an easy Sabbath-day's journey into the town. Not long ago, in Safed, the Jewish leaders seriously discussed a proposal for shifting the marks to the limits of the city, and putting them about midway between Safed and Ja'meh, so that the Jews might be able to go out on the Sabbath day to meet a benefactor who was expected thence.—Rev. William Ewing, in The Sunday-School Times.

The ancient Syriac version of the gospels is claimed to be older than the Greek, and to be preserved in the very vernacular of the writers of the New Testament. But after all let us be not too sure of its antiquity. Prof. Edwin Johnson, in his "Rise of Christendom," endeavors to prove that the whole Bible is of modern origin, having been fabricated by Benedictine and Basilian monks since the revival of learning. He maintains that the Hebrew Bible is a hundred years younger than the Moslem scriptures, embodied in the chronicle of Al Tabari and the Koran; and that the New Testament is two hundred years younger still. In other words, that the chronicle of Al Tabari was composed or redacted about A.D. 900, the Hebrew Bible about A.D. 1000, and the Greek or Latin Testament about A.D. 1200. This would make Christianity only about seven hundred years old.—Antichrist.

News and Notes.

The Arizona campaign rolls on in lively style. Even the Arizona Kicker has put in an appearance, only he is all the way from London, a wandering Bible pedler dispatched from the old world to convert the heathen of "the wild and woolly West." He is a nondescript-looking individual, like one of Dickens's caricatures, a cockney of the cockneys, thoroughly evangelized, and pervaded by a general air of almightiness, as if he had come direct from the throne of grace. He ventilated the stock arguments of the Christian and dealt mainly in abuse and exhortation. He mounted the platform on Thursday last after my lecture on "What is Liberalism?" with the vim of a young David determined to destroy the Goliath of Infidelity. He declared that he had gone all through the slums of London, and had met with any quantity of "Secularists," all of whom were afraid to die. His idea of a Secularist was certainly as clear as mud. In evangelical parlance, the Secularist is a "bloated sinner." The Bible defender said that my face had a look of "dark despair," while his was all bright and shining with the grace of God. "Look at my countenance," he shouted, "is it not beaming with beauty and happiness?" At which the audience shouted uproariously, for a more cadaverous face was never presented to human vision. Turning to me he exploited, "You were once a Christian minister. Were you a fraud then, or are you a fraud now?" What a truly Christian argument that was. I replied to him that I was as honest then as now; only then I was in the same state of ignorance in which he at present rejoiced. He stated that Christians had faith in God, and always died with blissful anticipation. I quoted to him the last words of Jesus, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" This made him mad, and he had the appearance of a bulldog who would like to throttle me then and there. We gave him another chance on Saturday night, when he displayed all the venom of orthodox polemics. When some of the audience began to go out he vomited forth, "Go to the saloons where you belong." When I quoted the text, "Except one come unto me and hate not his father," etc., he gesticulated wildly with his arm and fiercely screamed, "You lie." On Sunday evening the chairman was obliged to call him to order, since he would not observe parliamentary rules and resorted to abuse both of the audience and the speaker, and gave no arguments, and represented nothing and nobody, and time was too precious to be wasted in any "bear fight" in which only the Bible exponent could show his capacity. The audience, which filled the house, unanimously approved the decision. Freethinkers desire all the counter arguments possible, and welcome gentlemen of every shade of opinion to their platform, but patience and courtesy cease to be virtues when the only result is billingsgate and the fanatical fury of the wild beast of orthodoxy. Our work is for something else than a "monkey and a parrot" exhibition, since Christianity is the only participant that can furnish the monkey and the parrot.

On Sunday afternoon, a series of "posers" in writing was presented; the following questions I was asked to publicly answer, which I did:

1. "Did not the word 'God' appear in the Declaration of Independence?" I answered, "Yes." The fathers of the republic were Deists, but not Christians. There is no Christ in the Declaration, and no God in the Constitution.

2. "Were not Washington, Jefferson, etc., Christians?" I answered, "No."

3. "Did not Voltaire recant?" I answered "No," and referred the questioner to "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which gives a true account of the matter. Voltaire went through a certain religious ceremony in order to insure a decent burial. This was to the disgrace of the church, but not of Voltaire.

4. "Do you believe in the materialization of spirits?" I answered, "No."

The fifth question was a rattler. "Is not Spiritualism the very acme of blind, abominable, juggernautical fetichism—in other words, the most gigantic farce of the nineteenth century?" I answered, "No," and referred the questioner to my lecture on "Modern Spiritualism and Freethought."

6. "Are not all or nearly all mediums frauds, impostors, and empirics?" I answered, "No." Some of them, perhaps about the same per cent that preachers are frauds, a larger per cent of whom are criminals than of any other class in the community.

7. "Do you consider the A. P. A. a true American society?" I answered that I was not in favor of secret political societies; and would not vote against any man simply on account of his religion. It is the church system I combat.

8. "Is the A. P. A. indorsed by Liberals?" I answered, "Not as a body. Some Liberals favor it, and some do not. It is a matter purely of personal opinion."

It is surmised that the Catholic priest was the author of these questions.

This is the only artillery that the Christians so far have been able to furnish; a "lame and impotent conclusion" to their proud boastings before the Freethought movement began. We have invited them to speak—offer them half the time; but they declare that they will answer only in their own pulpits. They started a revival meeting to offset our work, but it wound up on Friday night last, and on Sunday evening an honest Christian who came to my lecture after going to church made the assertion that my audience was larger than the attendance of all the churches put together. So it seems that we are getting in the swim. Indeed three-fourths of the people here are Liberals, and they are beginning to find out that Liberalism is a great and splendid movement the world over. We have started a local organization and nearly one hundred names are on the list, and the same number have united with the national organization. Dr. Miller is a royal worker. He has wonderful persistence. He is not daunted by any difficulties, and he has the enthusiasm of humanity. A thousand like him would make a magnificent army of progress. He is determined that Arizona shall come into the Union as a Secular state, and be foremost in the march of human freedom. I have high hopes of this territory, which is so wonderful in its history, so wonderful in its wealth, so splendid in its attractions, and on the verge of such vast improvements. Arizona will one day be the land to which every traveler will resort, for it surpasses the world in the grandeur and magnificence of its scenery. The great canon of the Colorado, wild and wonderful as a dream, two hundred miles in length, is without doubt the most amazing realm of picturesque and sublime panoramas which physical nature can unfold, and the mind is lost amidst its immense and gigantic forms. My pilgrim's journey will never be ended until it has traversed these vast and radiant solitudes where it seems as if ancient eons had piled their most marvelous exhibitions.

The San Francisco mountains are a lofty and resplendent landmark all over this wide country. One day last week I mounted a neighboring hill and beheld their white and brilliant peaks, and other mountains with their glittering banners stretching afar off into Utah.

I think my friends in the blustering East would envy me if they could realize what lovely weather we have had here during the past week. It is like paradise. We have scarcely needed a fire. Beautiful blue skies, warm golden sunshine over hill and dale, marvelous sunsets with gates of glory to the sparkling immensity of night, with its unclouded stars and round, full moon majestically sailing on—these are the jewels which Arizona sets in the pathway of the pioneer, and I can rejoice in nature's sweetest smiles and loveliest adornments while knocking old superstition in the head. I couldn't find a more exhilarating battlefield for Freethought. There is nothing "cabined, cribbed, confined." It is all open and vast, with infinit variety, and it makes one feel strong to fight tyranny when he touches earth even amidst desert sands with such surroundings of shining sky, snow-capped mountains, and valleys bathed in silver and gold as morning and evening pursue their entrancing flight.

Dr. Miller has some staunch co-workers here, and in future pages I shall set down the roll of honor. It is impossible to mention all, for the list is constantly increasing. Of course there is plenty of hard work before us—Freethought doesn't grow in a night. It isn't merely a wave of excitement. It is a long and laborious pathway, up hill and stormy at times. But it has its compensations. If we climb we see vast extended prospects. If the storm comes its music is like a trumpet. Then there are golden days, hospitable homes, glowing firesides, fountains of song, and treasures of knowledge which never could come except to one who is always on the march.

Observations.

It is recorded in the newspapers that a mass meeting was recently held in Tacoma, Wash., to protest against the edict of the pope placing Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, and Sons of Temperance under the ban of the Catholic church. The meeting was attended by two thousand persons, which two thousand persons, I should say, would have done well if they had remained to rejoice; for anything that will keep people out of the Catholic church is worth celebrating. To show how little these protesters thought about what they were doing it is only needful to observe that the meeting was held under the auspices of the American Protective Association, an order that excludes Roman Catholics from membership. And then, again, some of the secret societies banished by the pope impose conditions upon their members which would make it impossible for a Freethinker to join them without misrepresenting his conscience. But membership in either the church or the secret orders is not compulsory, and such being the fact, I do not see how the situation as regards them or their regulations could be any more delightful than it now is.

Helen Gardener delivered an address in the Park Street church, Boston, the other night, on "Woman as an Annex." The church has always been known as "Brimstone Corner," which, considering the speaker's well-known sentiments on the subject of brimstone, gives the event a peculiar interest. I get this item from Col. C. S. Smart, who entertains great admiration and respect for Helen, although she is his wife.

My attention has been called to an important subject by the receipt of some copies of the daily papers from Oshkosh, Wis., in which the morality of dancing is discussed by representatives of the three sexes—men, women, and clergymen. Not long ago the Ladies' Benevolent Society of Oshkosh announced a series of dancing parties in the interest of charity. The ministerial association of the city, members of which were not invited, held a meeting and passed resolutions condemning the scheme; and then, as the ladies persisted in carrying out their program, the ministers preached sermons in denunciation of dancing. They said that it was an unwholesome amusement, especially dangerous to girls wearing corsets; that it was opposed to Christian sentiment, and that, above all, it was immoral. It takes a minister or priest to plow the subsoil of baseness, and the way these fellows discussed the night side of human nature was calculated to make the innocent vile. One of them quoted from Christ the statement that for a man to look upon a woman with a desire, as it were, to become more intimately acquainted with her, was tantamount to breaking the seventh commandment; and he maintained that when two people of opposing sexes were partners in a dance both of them committed this offense. Summed up, the argument of the elegy was that dancing flourishes because the sexes unite in it. Otherwise, they ask, why do not women dance with women, and men with men?

The ladies of Oshkosh exclaim, "The idea!" and neither admit nor deny the clerical theory; but the editor of the Morning Times published in that city repudiates it with scorn, and delivers himself of the opinion that when a minister charges that "the pleasure of dancing consists in sensual suggestions, he gratuitously slurs the women of Oshkosh, and deliberately makes an accusation of the vilest nature against every one of them." Still the editor does not answer the clergymen's question why men and women dance with each other instead of with persons of their own sex. I would like to have him do that. I have laid the matter before Mrs. M., who is a dancer, and she says the ministers are real mean to talk that way. I inquire if it is a fact that ladies enjoy dancing with gentlemen more than with other ladies, and she replies that she sees no harm in it if they do. Mrs. M. does not set herself up for a thinkess, and has not revised her language for publication, but the demurrer suggests that perhaps there is nothing inherently wicked in the fact that the human race is divided into branches differing somewhat as to sex, and that this divergence is productive of felicitous results. By failing to recognize the salient facts in the case the editor of the Oshkosh Morning Times has missed a valuable opportunity for ethical disquisition. As for the clergymen concerned in the discussion, they are pigs rooting in a flower garden.

The gold reserve in the United States treasury is falling, as usual. It is thirty millions below the minimum prescribed by lawyers, and is more like a remnant than a reserve. About this time look out for another issue of bonds, for the gentlemen who coöperate with the administration in this matter are still sucking hard at the treasury tap, and bonds are the only known thing that will induce them even momentarily to let up. The system is run like a hydraulic ram, and the money engineers at Washington seem to be surprised that the ram does not throw back into the reservoir all the water it takes out; hence the demand for a currency bill to reverse the order of nature. A bill to cover the necessities of the case and preserve the system would be entitled, "An act providing that all streams shall run uphill, and declaring that an emergency exists." If the scheme can be applied to currency, why not to currents?

The truth becomes apparent that when these financial engineers diverted into the commercial sea that stream of silver which flowed from the mountains to the mint, they turned their reservoir into a stagnant pool, the little yellow rill trickling into it barely compensating for leakage and evaporation. It is a good enough watering-trough for the syndicate camel of many stomachs, and its outlet into the sacks of the bond-owners is a shining river; nevertheless those who carry water to replenish it would most gladly see it dammed.

Mr. J. D. Shaw of the Independent Pulpit deems it necessary to repel the charge of Mr. C. C. Moore of the Blue Grass Blade that he does not advocate "moral reforms." A little reflection will show Mr. Shaw that what he mistakes for an accusation is in a high sense a testimonial. It means that he has the habit of minding his own business and respecting the right of others to do the same, and that his merits have compelled recognition. Few rewards are greater than that.

As a rule which knows no exception, the moral reformer is a nuisance to the extent that he devotes himself to the business. I have to use the word "reformer," because that is what he thinks he is and what general consent admits him to be, but when you get at his doctrine you will find he is no reformer at all, but an imprisoner; and that is not reform—it is reversion. His goal is not reformation but the penitentiary, and he measures his success by the number of persons he has thrown into jail. When he reports his arrests and spoiliations, the fools gape and gurgle, "What a monstrous sight of good that man is doing!" Does the good actualize? Devil a bit. How, then, do they know that any good has been done? They don't; but they hear the bazoo of the reformer, and they hee-honk in unison. Besides, they believe in moral reform and don't see how the doors of a jail can close on any man and not have a moralizing influence on those outside. Let them draw the inference and it is immaterial who furnishes the facts.

The friendless, the unpopular, and the unlucky are meat for the moral reformer. The liquor seller with small means is unpopular, and one moral reformer pounces upon him. The street-walker is friendless, and another moral reformer gets his claws upon her. The advocate of unfamiliar views about social relations is an outcast, and a third moral reformer leaps astride of his neck. The unhappily married being out of luck, other moral reformers look to it that laws are passed to keep them so; while the whole brood sleep with an eye open to catch an infidel off his guard. The moral reformer knows no distinction between a guilty act and a wrong one, between a crime and a mistake. A malicious, vindictive hater of mankind, he is a pestilence to himself and the world he lives in.

The moral reformer—that is, the moral imprisoner—to wit, the Sundayite, the theocrat, the divorce tinkerer, the purity pander, the literary censor—I regard as a good deal less desirable citizen than our open enemies, those revolutionary individuals called propagandists by deed; for when one of these last gets in his work, we are permitted summarily to hang him, while as to the others, though they are the more dangerous in the proportion that the power they invoke for evil is greater, yet we must protect them out of respect for that liberty which they design to destroy. I should make a very indifferent judge under present laws and precedents, being firmly convinced that if a person were to come before me and demand that a neighbor be fined or imprisoned for violation of one of these "moral," sumptuary, or religious statutes, I should inflict upon him, for the safety of society, the penalty prescribed for the accused.

Let Mr. Shaw cherish the words of Mr. Moore. Let him paste them in his hat, and they shall be as a chaplet upon his brow.

The religious organizations of New York, through their charitable institutions, are getting a flavor of what they have to admit is a union of church and state. A majority of clergymen deny that public appropriations for the support of religion constitute in any sense such a union. So long as the churches can get exemption, protection, and appropriations from the state, and use those privileges as they see fit, there is no union according to the preachers; but when the officers of state begin to overlook the affairs of the church and to inquire what use it is making of its subsidies, then the union is acknowledged and the church protests. Now the fact is that the charitable institutions of this state are sought else but annexed to the churches they are run by. They are sectarian, or at least denominational. They are used by the various ecclesiastical bodies as an excuse for soliciting contributions, as a beggar exhibits his self-raised sores for the purpose of exciting sympathy and procuring alms. A dollar appropriated for their support is a gift to the churches. Heretofore the managers have had but to walk up to the comptroller's window and get their coin, but under the new constitution of New York money is to be paid to them only upon recommendation of the state board of charities. Here we have state surveillance of religious institutions, which in the eyes of an American churchman is nothing less than Satanic. The minister knows it is his province to dictate to the politician, and he has his nose in all public concerns as far as he can thrust it, but when, in consideration of favors granted, the politician takes a look behind the altar, that is quite a different proposition. This state of affairs is one that has arisen necessarily out of the nature of the parties concerned. For if the clergyman knows that he is commissioned by the almighty God to run the earth, the politician is equally sure that he is authorized by the almighty Mob to discharge the same office. No minister ever for a moment entertains a suspicion that his functions are limited, and from what I have read of congressional and legislative debates, I conclude that it is the same with the politician—a measure may be for or against his interests, but it is never outside his "scope." The ministers up to the present time have been calling on the politician for favors, and getting them. Now the politician is looking after his investments. He suspects that there must be something in this charity racket, or the priests and clergy would not work it so industriously.

Up to this point my sympathies are with the politician. He has made sundry laws and ordinances at the request of the church, and he has given it money and land—not his own, of course, but he has given them; and so, as a patron of the institution, he is, I think, entitled to his squawk. Let the good work go on.

Lecture Notes.

On the 8th of January I arrived at my first appointment on my Eastern trip, Moline, Ill. The January snow storms, which are so well known on the Iowa prairies, were in full force, and, outwardly, the scene was not very inviting. My correspondent, Mr. John L. Bean, of Rock Island, met me at the depot and conducted me to his glowing fireside. Mr. Bean is just eighty-one years old— hale, hearty, and yet full of the fire of youth. He made all arrangements for my lectures. The Unitarian church had been secured, and there I gave my first lecture on the "Great Religious Conspiracy." Some of our Unitarian friends objected to my use of the term "religious." They interpret religion to mean "right living." To this definition no Liberal will take exception. Yet the fact remains that the word as used in the literature of the present time, and as understood by the majority of the people, refers to God, heaven, hell, a future life, and our relations to the supernatural. In the progress of thought old words will change their meanings, but to avoid misunderstanding a word must be used as the majority accept it. The word Christian is understood to mean one who believes in the divinity of Christ and the inspiration of the Bible, even though many call themselves Christians who do not accept these things. So with religion. As logical reasoning must depend on correct definitions and clear understanding, it is necessary to cultivate both. The minister of the church, Rev. Ida C. Houlton, honored me by her presence the first evening. Wednesday evening I spoke on "The Bible in the Light of Modern Criticism." The Friday night lecture was postponed on account of a snow storm until Sunday afternoon, when we had the largest audience during the course. Moline contains about fifteen thousand inhabitants, and is a manufacturing town on a large scale. It has, I believe, the largest plow works in the world. Orthodoxy, however, is also strong, yet I found many staunch Liberals. It was a pleasure for me to visit Mr. Orlando Child, who has lived here since 1856. Mr. Child is also in the evening of life, being eighty-three, and may he yet reach the hundredth milestone. Messrs. Hemmway and Woodworth, officers of the church, also gave us assistance. Mr. H. F. Wehrend and his mother are substantial Freethinkers. Sunday morning I attended Miss Houlton's lecture on the "Origin of Man," the ninth in a series. It was scientific, eloquent, and so plain that all could understand this, to many, unfamiliar subject. If the one hundred thousand preachers in this country would preach such sermons as this one, ignorance would soon vanish. The orthodox pulpit has told the world that Freethought throws no light upon the great problem of human existence. While the mystery is not yet wholly solved, infidels have discovered more truth regarding it than the Christian church, with all its pretense. It has only dogmatized, principally by saying that man arose from a mud puddle. Among the attendants at my Moline lectures was Mr. Scharfenburg, of Davenport, Ia., a man who is not only a true-blue Liberal, but a lecturer himself of much ability, speaking both in the English and the German languages. He invited me to give a lecture in Davenport. Though we had short notice, a good audience greeted me in the Unitarian church. The Rev. Arthur Judy, who preaches in this church, is a splendid man, and it is largely due to his efforts that my lecture was a success. He made an appropriate speech in introducing me, and closed the meeting by another one. Mr. Judy's church, I believe, is the most prosperous of the Unitarian denomination in Iowa. He said that no man with honest opinions, properly expressed, should be refused a hearing in his pulpit. Mr. Bean came over from Rock Island. After the lecture we repaired to Mr. Scharfenburg's house, where I was entertained for an hour by himself and family. All are Liberals to the core. After a short visit again with Mr. Bean, I left for other fields of labor.

While I am in the East, I hope my Liberal friends in Iowa, and the adjoining states, will arrange for many lectures during the spring and summer. I will then be with them, and hope to be kept busy.

MR. REMSBURG did not have a very large audience at Lexington, Ky., but his address was appreciated by those who were wise enough to hear it, if we may judge by these warm words of praise from the Press-Transcript: "Mr. J. E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kan., one of the most eminent Freethought lecturers on the American Liberal platform, delivered an eloquent lecture in the Court House last night to about sixty men. His subject was 'False Claims of the Church,' and was a masterly effort in every sense of the word. He is a clear, logical writer, a powerful and a ready thinker, and is a brilliant and pungent satirist. His smooth, even sentences, splendid rhetoric, and grand reach of thought make him one of the greatest as well as one of the most captivating speakers in the anti-religious world."

MANCHESTER, Mo., Jan. 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.25 to renew my subscription to the paper, and for "Darwin and After Darwin," also the ANNUAL for 1895. I am reading "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" with the greatest interest, and consider it one of the most valuable books that I have ever perused. It merits a large circulation, and I hope that you will soon have to issue a second edition. The portraits alone are worth the price of the book, and are much superior to what I expected to get when I subscribed for the volume.

SANTA CRUZ, CAL., Jan. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1, for which send me Colonel Ingersoll's "Holy Bible," "Lincoln," and "Shakspeare," also the ANNUAL. A correspondent from Finland writes: "Queer things are happening here; citizens are now made by force to mourn in black for the late czar, and men and women pray long in the churches, and their eyes become black-ringed from sadness. If you ask them why this grief and sorrow, they fear to even answer. They fear to speak the truth, or to talk at all of Freethought. They know the sun shuns Siberia; the knout cuts the flesh into mince; it withers many; it kills many, and many it turns into beasts; and Katorga is as the blight of God, but Christ said, 'Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted' (Mat. v, 4)." Is the God-in-the-Constitution party in favor of such a barbarous government? I cannot believe in the Russian nagaika, and if told by some God-party man that "I must believe or go to hell," then I'll go to hell; that's all!

New Soil Turned.

ORANGEVILLE, PA., Dec. 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: On the 26th I had the pleasure of listening to a lecture by J. E. Remsburg, at Benton, Pa., on "False Claims." Mr. Remsburg lectured at Glen City in the southern end of this county on the 24th, which, with the lecture at Benton, are the only lectures on Freethought in this county, so far as I know. The local press at Benton gave us the usual free advertisement by calling names, etc., but they did us more service than they intended; but for them we would not have been well advertised. We had a good meeting; quite a success, considering all the opposition. The audience was not large, but there were several ladies present, although we were right in one of the worst blizzards we have had for years. Most of those present were young men, and a quieter, more orderly meeting no church in our country could boast. The expenses were all paid by voluntary contributions from friends; there was no admission charged, nor collection taken up among the audience. Now that the ice is broken, I think there should be no difficulty in having many more such meetings. There are enough of us, if we can get together; we are unfortunately too poor to drive ahead as I would like.

Yours for liberty, M. S. HAYHURST.

Now.

They've been singing sweet songs of the "Long Ago,"

And the beautiful "By-and-By,"

With never a strain for the passing time

We are living in, you and I.

The long ago is an old, old time,

And a trying one when it was here;

Only the enchantment that distance lends

Makes it now seem so dear.

The sweet by-and-by is a radiant time

When seen through the coming years;

Say, will it ever come to be now

And chase away all our fears?

When the sweet by-and-by comes to be now,

And the now is the long ago,

Will hands grow weary and hearts still ache,

As now, I would like to know?

Hearts grow wearied with waiting in vain

For the sweet by-and-by to come.

The now slips into the long ago,

Yet 'tis now, and 'tis wearisome.

And now is the time we must do our work;

We may dream of the long ago,

And wistfully hope for the sweet by-and-by

But now is all that we know.

O sing us a song for the present time

That shall keep up our waning faith,

While the sweet by-and-by is coming to us,

And the long ago seems but a myth.

THORNBURG, IA., Dec. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The tab on THE TRUTH SEEKER wrapper warns me that we have about come to the station to which my passage is paid, and I must either renew or get off. But we are only half way up the mountain of "universal mental liberty," and as I wish to be among the crew when the summit is reached, I shall keep on paying my fare as long as I can scrape up the shakels.

I have been studying my bible, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," some lately, and find it a great improvement over the old Jewish production of several thousand years ago. Brother Putnam has done us a valuable service in writing it. It should be translated into the leading languages of the world and widely circulated.

It is wonderful how many of the great newspapers of our land are making false and bitter attacks on leading Freethinkers, especially Ingersoll, of late. I believe it is a good sign. These articles are no doubt prompted by the preachers, who are not so anxious to save people's souls as they are to obtain their money. It makes one think of Heston's cartoon in which the Freethought press makes the animals hiss. Every Freethinker who emerges from one of Ingersoll's lecture halls means less pelf for the preacher.

Inclosed you will find $4.50, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER and "The Dynamic Theory," by J. B. Alexander.

Yours for mental liberty,

The Loving Charity of Religion.

PORTLAND, ME., Jan. 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For the inclosed $1 please send to my friend Thompson Bronson C. Keeler's "Short History of the Bible," also the ANNUAL for 1895. The Rev. H. L. Hastings, of Boston, lectured here last week and utterly annihilated Colonel Ingersoll; that is, most of his hearers thought so. I have waited for some one to call attention to his illogical arguments; shall do so myself, but it is doubtful if I can get such an article inserted in any of our papers.

The following, which I handed to one of the evening papers, did not appear. A similar article appeared in one of the Sunday papers, but it did not record all of the horrible speech: "While returning from the lecture of the Rev. Mr. Hastings last evening, I overheard a remark, inspired by religious bigotry, that would make a devil blush. A woman was telling her companion of two little girls who were going to attend some theatrical performance, but before the time arrived they were stricken with diphtheria and, she added, 'In my heart I thanked God for the diphtheria that kept those children from attending the theater.' The worship of a wooden idol is a better religion than the creed that inspired such a hellish sentiment." It wouldn't do to show how a belief in the Bible stifles the instincts of humanity. H. Q. NORTON.

Discovery of an Anonymous Author.

BANGOR, MICH., Jan. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: John S. Patterson, who died October 31st, at his home, Berlin Heights, Erie county, O., in his seventy-third year, is the author of "Conflict in Nature and Life," an anonymous publication issued some years since by D. Appleton & Co. It produced a profound sensation among the forty or more reviewers who noticed it at the time. Most of them spoke well of it. Many marveled that a work of such evident merit should be published anonymously.

One of these reviewers, in a Boston paper, said: "In trying to conjecture who the author could be I have thought over all the college professors of New England and I do not find one capable of producing such a book." The author was self-taught, never having had the advantage of a collegiate education or university extension.

This work of five hundred pages, as set forth on the title page, "is a study of the antagonism in the constitution of things for the elucidation of the problem of good and evil and the reconciliation of optimism and pessimism," and was the result of twenty years of patient study and research amid the labors of a farm and providing for the needs of a family. He learned both German and French that he might go to the fountainhead of the knowledge he sought. He aimed not for fame, but labored for the love of knowledge and truth and the hope of benefiting others, together with the joy of literary work; consequently this, with several lesser works, was published without his name, made known for the first through friends since his death.

By nature a reformer, with an early inclination for the acquirement of knowledge, he was already deep in the studies of "Conflict in Nature and Life" when Joseph Treat established a Socialistic community at Berlin Heights, O., nearly forty years ago. The reformatory tendencies of this community—a sort of Buckeye Brook Farm—with its crude embodiment of more modern altruism, attracted him and he settled with his wife and four children on a fruit farm one mile east of the community, in an atmosphere of culture, refinement, and progress, as he believed, though distant from the large centers of intellectual culture. Here he labored with brain and brawn. At one time he was closely connected with the Social Revolutionist, a social reform journal published weekly by the community.

One edition of this journal, like many another reformer of old, was burned to appease the indignation of conservative citizens. A delegation of women of the Presbyterian church waylaid and overpowered one of the publishers, Francis Barry, on his way to the post-office with the weekly edition for subscribers, seized and burned them in front of their church.

The student-author did not realize his expectations in this community, and came to feel a measure of unhappiness in the social ostracism of his children, when they came to maturity, that he had never felt for himself, knowing it to be part of a reformer's portion. Finding parental instinct stronger than reformatory principles, he withdrew to himself and his studies, seeking companionship only in his family, his farm, and a few choice friends; striving to solve the problem of good and evil in their relations to human destiny, almost until his last breath, being sick but eight hours. He made no profession of a religious character. A devoted student of nature and life, their relations and correlations to the great sum of human existence, gave him a faith in the ultimate good of his kind that placed him beyond the reach of the fear of death and its unknown afterwards.

From a Tireless Worker.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Jan. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In a three quarter-column report of Rev. E. H. Delk's sermon criticising Mr. Remsburg's recent lecture here, the Hagerstown Globe reports Reverend Delk as saying that certain persons are "not Freethinkers, but loose thinkers and fools." Yet the Globe returned unpublished the following brief and dispassionate defense of Freethinkers, and the Mail has, for ten days, withheld from publication a somewhat similar defense. We might print and circulate this defense on handbills, stating as an excuse therefor our inability to get access to the columns of local papers, but, since those papers gave comparatively fair reports of Mr. Remsburg's lecture, we prefer not to thus cast on them the reflection that Hagerstown's "freedom of the press" lies in handbills or circulars only. D. W. G.

FREETHOUGHT DEFENDED.

MR. EDITOR: Christian charity should, in justice to Mr. J. E. Remsburg and to Freethinkers generally, certainly permit the correction of some misconceptions regarding them, evinced in the kindly criticism by Rev. E. H. Delk. Without genuine intellectual hospitality in the heart, cold alms-giving "charity," merely from the pocket, is but a hollow mockery.

Like our courts of justice, Freethinkers seek truth by equally hearing both sides. The conspicuous absence, at Mr. Remsburg's lecture, of the specially invited clergy was unfortunate.

Mr. Remsburg charitably said: "Christians are better than their creeds." And he attacked "Churchianity" rather than Christianity, as any one can see by reading his entire lecture which THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette Place, N. Y., printed verbatim.

Can a just God send murderers to heaven and their "unprepared" moral victims to hell? Is it wicked to think God more just than some Christians think him? Will heaven prefer the society of repentant murderers to that of lifelong moral men? Does such a doctrine promote morality?

Reverend Delk thinks that propagating Freethought may be a greater crime than murder! Would he then inflict a heavier penalty on it? Would he resurrect the Inquisition and its tools of torture? If not, why not?

Until quite recently, the New York Observer claimed that Thomas Paine recanted and repented before his death. Either he was a Christian then, or Washington, Lincoln, and Wendell Phillips, who never joined the church, were no Christians. As the clergy, in Paine's day, freely imbibed intoxicants, he may have done likewise, though it has never been proven that he did. Leastwise, his head was clear enough to produce arguments so strong that the clergy prefer to attack his habits rather than his arguments. And they prefer today to "answer" Freethinkers by similar personalities.

If, as Reverend Delk avers, "Freethinking and loose living are bed-fellows," why are there no Freethinkers in our jails and penitentiaries? Does he not "throw aside fact" here, and become a "loose thinker?"

In this country church and state are practically separate. The church maintains discipline by the fear of punishment and hope of reward beyond the grave. The state maintains order by jails, penitentiaries, and gibbets here. If "secularism, as a moral force, is a farce," as Reverend Delk asserts, would he then abolish the state and its punishments? If not, why not?

For slavery, Abolitionists offered negation—no slavery; for witch-burning, reformers offered negation—no witch-burning; and for superstition, Freethinkers offer negation—no superstition. Yet Reverend Delk objects to negation. When doctors cure their patients of small-pox, must they necessarily give them some other disease in its stead? Is not truth a sufficient substitute for error?

Belief results from weighing evidence. Sufficient evidence will convince men, even against their will. Hence lawyers, politicians, and theologians endeavor to exclude adverse evidence. Belief is, therefore, as involuntary, as uncontrollable as your heart-beats. Will God bless or curse us for that over which we have no control—our belief? Would we not slander God to so accuse him? Men make books, but can't make your brains or reason. God-made reason is a better guide than man-made books. Don't bury your talents in a creed, but use them. Free-thought appeals to man's noblest faculty—the only one that distinguishes him from the brute—reason.

With malice toward none and intellectual hospitality toward all, we invite you to reason. PROGRESSIVE FREETHINKER.
Breathesville, Md., Jan. 4, 1895.

What Do You Believe?

MONTPELIER, IND., Dec. 15, 1894.

DEAR READER: You profess to be a Christian. Do you claim to believe the primary doctrines of the Christian religion—that the Lord God made Adam and Eve and put them in the Garden of Eden and forbade them partaking of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil; but that they ate of the forbidden fruit, for which offense the Lord God pronounced the curse on the man and the woman and turned them out of the garden, but "unto Adam also and to his wife did the Lord God make coats of skins and clothed them"? This is claimed to be man's fall from a state of perfection to that of total depravity, and afterward mankind became more wicked continually.

The Lord God tried various methods to appease his anger and to redeem man; finally, he sent his only begotten son into the world to suffer an ignominious death on the cross as a sacrifice acceptable to God for the redemption of such as accept the terms of salvation, but such as die without accepting such terms must suffer the penalty of eternal torment.

The above I understand to be cardinal Christian doctrines, which must include the history of creation as taught in the first three chapters of Genesis, which contemplates the flat earth theory with the firmament that divides the waters below the firmament from the waters above the firmament and places the sun, moon, and stars in the firmament. It also contemplates a personal God, for Adam and Eve "heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the cool of the day, and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God among the trees of the garden, and the Lord God called unto Adam and said unto him 'Where art thou?'" My Christian friend, if you accept this creation story, I advise you to be just to yourself, and send twenty-five cents to the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER and procure the "Irreconcilable Records; or, Genesis and Geology," by William Denton, and read it. If you believe the Lord God or his voice to be a personal entity capable of walking in the garden and Adam and Eve capable of hiding from him among the trees, please reflect on the immensity of the universe; consider the littleness and yet the greatness of man, who can exert quite a controlling influence on the development of the surface of the earth through the labor he bestows upon it, and then contemplate the magnitude of the earth, and that science teaches us that the earth is only one of a number of planets revolving around our sun, and it only one of a number of suns with their planetary groups revolving around them and all revolving around their great central sun, which perhaps forms only one constellation of stars. In order that we may form a partial idea of the vastness of the universe, we will suppose we are in the center and we behold the immensity of the starry heavens, each body a meteor, comet, planet, or sun developing to more refined conditions; some not sufficiently developed to sustain animal or vegetable life, others farther advanced than our planet earth; but we will apply the powerful telescopic lens at the James Lick observatory, and find we know very little of the sublime immensity. We suppose ourselves to be in the center and suppose a being on a planet on the extreme outside of our supposed universe making observations and conclusions similar to what we have done, and he imagines himself in the center by the same process of reasoning, beholds another still farther on who observes and reasons in the same way, because he is as near the center as we are, because immensity can have no bounds.

When we contemplate the imbecil idea of the man-made Lord God creating the universal whole out of nothing, who can avoid seeing the inconsistency? The idea is contrary to all sound philosophy at best, and the Lord God is, comparatively speaking, as impotent for such a task as the infant sitting on the floor sucking its rattle-box; and yet on these silly claims are founded the fall of man, and on that the Christian messiah and the absurd doctrine of the immaculate conception.

Sacrifice to appease any angry God or secure his favor has always attended the religions of the past since we have had any means of knowing their history.

Man was ignorant of the laws of his environment, and mistaking the casualties of nature for the vengeance of a supposed angry God, his fear was excited and the plan was suggested of seeking his forgiveness through prayer or supplication, and praises and presents in the form of sacrifices, and the greater the sacrifice of the donor the greater the worth of the oblation.

A storm may rage or a flood may deluge a city or an earthquake may rend a continent, regardless of a man or a community of human beings. All these casualties take place regardless of human existence; if a city of human beings is in the way, it does not check the forces of nature—they are propelled by laws foreign to man's special welfare and not designed to make him suffer. But man, in his ignorance, thinks he is of more importance than all the remainder of natural things. If a man gets scalded to death by the explosion of a steam boiler, or swallowed up by an earthquake, it is not a god's wickedness but a casualty resulting from the fact of the man being in the way of the impending danger.

Natural causes must produce their necessary results, and all the prayers and supplications ever uttered will not suspend this law of cause and effect—therefore, prayers have no effect excepting on the minds of the audience. We are advised to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread"—it says: Give without any thought of compensation—that is, I am to receive bread without earning it, although it requires labor to produce it; so I am to pray for my bread, and some other person is to do the work to produce it without remuneration. "Ask and ye shall receive" is another promise that amounts to the same thing, to live on the labor of others without giving a compensation. "Take no thought for the morrow" is another theory that is even more untenable than the others. Forethought is strictly necessary to perpetuate our existence. The person who takes no thought for the future must have a care-taker or die of want, because though it must be exerted to perpetuate any animal existence; the most stupid animal must take thought for its existence, or some higher intelligence must think for it, or it must die of want.

The great redeeming clause of the Sermon on the Mount is the command to do as you would be done by, which is merely borrowed from a more ancient author—Confucius.

I would like to show that the religion taught by Jesus is obtained from what the Parsees taught as the doctrine relative to their God Vishnu and his son and mediator Krishna, and that this was amalgamated with Judaism, and known as the doctrines of the Essenes, and also that the religion we call Christianity is an amalgamation of Essenism and paganism, but lack of space forbids.

There is nothing miraculous or mysterious about it, but this amalgamated religion was forced upon the different states of the world by military power and the shedding of rivers of blood.

Such, in brief, is the history of Christianity, which has been and is a hindrance to the development of man's better nature.

Secular Work in Oregon.

Jan. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of Oregon are thoroughly alive. The secret has been solved and those who, only a few years ago, despaired of ever seeing the Free-thought flag firmly planted on the western coast, are now jubilant over the success under the new modus operandi.

We have learned to meet the enemy on home ground. So long as Liberalism was unorganized and championed by comparatively only a few, and most of them traveling lecturers, the Christian churches felt no insecurity, but when we place a permanent lecturer in a town or city, whose business it is to organize Secular Sunday-schools, Young People's societies, Free Reading clubs, etc., there is a decided manifestation of unrest among the church leaders. They know that the success of their organization is due to the fact that they have furnished entertainment for the young. Secularists acknowledge this fact, but have failed to profit by it. Although far from perfection, the progress of the cause on this coast during the past two years is ample evidence that our system is not entirely a bad one.

Christmas, the old pagan holiday in honor of the return of the Sun, was appropriately observed in Portland. A few of the most radical Liberals objected to celebrating the day simply because it would seem that we were perpetuating Christian superstition. Others maintained that the most effectual way of destroying the superstitious ideas associated with the day would be to hold a celebration and explain to the children the true origin of Christmas and Santa Claus. Consequently, the Portland Secular Sunday-school gave a very pleasing entertainment at the Secular church on Sunday afternoon, December 23d. The stage was artistically decorated with evergreens and flags, and a ladder, wound with red and blue bunting, was suspended diagonally across the wall just behind the speaker's stand. Upon this ladder were hung numerous presents for the Sunday-school children. The exercises consisted of a portion of the regular Sunday-school work, a musical and literary program by the children, and a review of the lesson upon the subject of Christmas, by Annie E. Barker, of the Forest Grove Secular Society, after which she delivered a short address upon the origin of the day, and also of Santa Claus, much to the interest and instruction of the children and the entertainment of the audience. She referred in very beautiful and appropriate words to the ladder—the emblem of progress—the means by which we mount to the most glorious intellectual and spiritual attainments. "We rise only by what we put under our feet," said the speaker; a thought that deeply impressed every hearer.

The unloading of the ladder was a feature of special interest to the little ones, and repaid them well for the excellent program they had so perfectly rendered. The officers of the Sunday school were remembered with beautiful gifts, as were also quite a number of friends who have done so much to make the organization a success. I feel that it is especially due to the faithful members of the Portland Secular church that I mention the very handsome and useful gift bestowed by them upon me as lecturer of the church. Entirely unforeseen by me, Chas. Hagner, treasurer of the organization, stepped upon the stage, and with eloquent and touching words, in the name of the Portland Secular church, presented me with six large and handsomely bound volumes of the choicest literary works. We were all happy at the close of the exercises and I know the memory of that afternoon will make everyone present nobler and better.

In the evening Mrs. Barker delivered the regular address. Her subject was, "The Origin of Christmas." The church was entirely filled, and for fully an hour she held this splendid audience spellbound under the power of her eloquence and logic. She is a faithful worker, and the splendid organizations she has built in Forest Grove and McMinnville are living proofs of her earnestness and ability. At both places there is a Secular Sunday-school in flourishing condition.

On Christmas morning Mrs. Barker and I went, by rail, to McMinnville, and that evening conducted another very successful Sunday-school entertainment in the Opera House. More than three hundred people were present. The program, consisting of declamations, recitations, and songs by the McMinnville Secular Sunday-school, was well carried out and reflected much credit upon Mrs. Barker and Mrs. Mary A. Booth, superintendent and assistant-superintendent of the school. The program was followed by an address by Mrs. Barker upon the subject "What Shall I Give?" It was delivered in her usual earnest manner and received with much interest. After the exercises the seats were removed and young and old participated in a social dance, for which our good friend Mr. Hatch and myself furnished violin music, with Mrs. Thurber at the piano. It was pronounced one of the most interesting hops held in McMinnville for years, and from the enthusiasm manifested, we have reasons to believe it was. Old people, who had not danced for years, again lost themselves in the entrancing whirl. My father, even in the decline of his eighty-fourth year, amused the crowd with his "pigeon-wing" dance. This was the first entertainment given by the McMinnville Secular Sunday-school. It has been organized only a little over two months.

On the following Sunday Mrs. Barker lectured again in Portland, while I filled her station at Forest Grove. Monday evening, New Year's eve, we closed our holiday campaign with a grand festival and entertainment at the Grova. The Secular Sunday-school there is the best in the state, not in numbers, but because in the third group there are nearly two dozen young men and women between the ages of sixteen and twenty. The juvenile choir, consisting of fourteen little girls and boys, furnished excellent music for the entertainment. Every piece on the program was well rendered, and the audience of over two hundred people showed their appreciation by loud and continued applause. The festival, under the supervision of Mrs. Crow, was a splendid feature in itself, and about sixty couples partook of the feast, after which many joined in dancing the old year out and the new year in. It was an evening long to be remembered by the people of Forest Grove.

Secularism must be built upon the social plain. The oftener we give public entertainments the more popular we become; to be successful we must be in a measure popular; so let us organize young people's societies of every kind, give socials and have various gatherings for entertainment, enlist the young in our ranks, and the Christian churches will be compelled to go out of business for want of converts.

The new year opens with bright prospects. We are filled with courage, and the support of every earnest Liberal in the state, of which we are assured, will make the coming year one of determined and effectual work for the cause. May the glad new year tidings fill the land and inspire the weaker and perhaps discouraged brothers and sisters to enter the work with new zeal. Hope, labor!

Yours for the uplifting of humanity,

NETTIE A. OLDS,

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Oh! Why These Salt Tears?

Oh! why are these salt tears flowing so fast,
And the pleasures of youth falling thick in the blast?
The cry of the children, the widow's sad moan,
And the tears of old age to a torrent have grown.

There's many a struggle beneath the blue sky,
Before we lie down on the cold earth to die;
There's many a sorrow our hearts to bereave
'Twixt the dawning of morn and the darkness of eve.

We should all strive alike to attain a high end;
Our pleasure, alone, on ourselves will depend;
With courage of soldiers, and hearts that will dare,
We should spurn all the wrinkles and furrows of care.

The laughter that sorrow and trouble doth drown
Is better by far than a tear or a frown;
This lesson to treasure where'er we may go—
The way to be blest is to make others so.

Oh, why should we mourn o'er the dark funeral pall?
Some day it must be in the presence of all;
We must list to the tones of the sad funeral knell,
As we gaze the last time on the face we loved well.

But the grave that was covered with flowers in the May Should not check our pleasure and gladness to-day;
With cheeks that are glowing, and eyes that are bright,
We should shine in our pain like a star in the night.

For death comes uncalled for, takes all in its greed,
From the sweet blushing rose to the plain garden weed;
And e'en the great monarch who sits on his throne
Must some day repose in the cold tomb alone.

Thus sorrow will meet us, in childhood she speaks,
Without introduction acquaintance she seeks;
She comes and detracts from our joy and our rest,
And appears at our feasts as an unwelcome guest.

Let us spurn all of sorrow; of anger, beware!
Look up through the dark at the stars shining there;
No heart is so wounded, no life is so sad,
But nature will bid it rejoice and be glad.

There's plenty to live for, and nothing to fear;
We can each be a gem in our own little sphere;
We can comfort and cheer those we meet all about,
And make sunshine within when the clouds are without.

We must work our own way; to be true, to be good,
Is nobler by far than salvation through blood.
And the kind heart that gives to the mother a hope,
Is better ten times than a priest or a pope.

If we wish to be blest, we must do what we can
To lift up the fallen and elevate man,
To conquer the heart-aches which now are so rife,
And scatter sweet flowers on the pathway of life.

Let us dry up the tears that are blinding our eyes,
And tear down the clouds that obscure the bright skies;
Shame Sorrow's dark visage and bid her to go,
Dig deep in the past and there bury our woe.

Thrice happy we'll be, if we'll wipe out our tears
And gladden our lives with the sunshine of years;

When the Earth Was Born.

It might have been born a hundred millions of years ago, and it might have been five hundred millions of years, or more or less. We have no means of knowing the actual date. It is evident, however, that in the long ago the planets, of which our earth is one, that now move so beautifully around the sun were each at different times sent out from the body of the sun, or thrown from its molten surface. Therefore, the sun is the parent of the planets that move around it. And, since the birth of these planets, which occurred at various periods, they have evidently been growing colder, or drying, sending their heat into space.

We would not know our present home for the same old earth had it been possible for us to have seen it in its infancy. Not a tree, not a leaf, not a tiny spot of grass even, not a living thing upon it, only a great mass of pulsing, puffy, seething matter, rolling, tumbling, hissing, and sputtering around and around, through the great pathless area called space. A very active baby was the earth, and as it whirled about it gradually grew a colder body and assumed, as is natural with infants, a different form. Mr. Mallet, an eminent geologist, has said that the earth is much smaller now than in its early life, that is, more compact and closer in its parts. He believes its diameter is less by one hundred and eighty-nine miles than at the time when it was a molten body only, and that its fiery surface must formerly extended out about ninety-four miles higher in space than in the present does its solid surface.

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

"Papa," said little Katie, "do you know how high those clouds are?" "No, child," answered her father, with an indulgent smile. "Well," said Katie, regarding them with critical eye, "I do. They're cirrus clouds, and they're about three and a half miles high. You didn't have very good schools when you was little, did you, papa?"—Chicago Tribune.

Whence some of the notions of antiquity which children of this generation possess are derived may be inferred from a remark made by a little girl. In the course of a lesson she was told that Egypt was the oldest country in the world. "Oh," exclaimed the little girl in surprise, "I thought Ireland was the really old country."—Boston Transcript.

The little girl had been fibbing and been caught in the act. Discipline was necessary, and her father, a prominent West Side politician, took her into the nursery, gave her a lecture on the sin of lying and scrubbed her mouth out thoroughly with soap and water. "Now, Winifred," he said, with a fatherly firmness, as he wiped away her tears, "you will never do the like again, will you dear?" "No, papa," answered Winifred, checking a sob. "Have you soaped your mouth out since the 'lection, papa?"—Chicago Tribune.

Correspondence.

MILFORD, MASS., Dec. 9, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Recently I picked up an old number of THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, dated 1885, which contains an article written by you on "The Relation of Children to Freethought." I want to endorse what you said upon the subject. I think that children are born Freethinkers, and should be taught only what they know is the truth.

Let us put into the hands of our little brothers and sisters instructive books. Let us teach them modern truth instead of ancient fables and impossible stories, many samples of which are to be found in the holy Bible, and to which I do not see how anyone with reason and common sense can give credit.

We should not teach the little ones ideas which after they are grown to manhood and womanhood they will be obliged to unlearn and for which they will remember us with unkind feelings.

Would it not be better to leave the mind to develop as best it can until the child is old enough to think for itself and thus find out the truth? Then surely it would not have to unlearn the truth.

My parents are Freethinkers, and I have always been left to think for myself. I bow my head to no god about which I know nothing, but look up to man and the advancement of the human race, and hope to be able to help mankind toward liberty and truth, the two bright guiding stars which have been shining down through all the ages, and though at times they have been nearly hidden by slavery, superstition, and untruth, they still shine out clear and bright and bid all mankind "Hail!"

Yours for truth, PEARLE P. BUXTON.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT.
By Samuel P. Putnam. (New York: The Truth Seeker Co.) 874 pp.; 21s.

The task which Mr. Putnam set himself in undertaking to write the history of Freethought from the time of Columbus to the present age was unquestionably one of a prodigious character, and its completion speaks well both for the courage and industry of the author. Mr. Putnam has for many years past occupied a prominent place in the popular Freethought movement in the United States, and both as a lecturer and a writer he has won for himself no small measure of praise. This, his chef d'œuvre, will, if we mistake not, raise him to a position of distinction among our friends on the other side of the Atlantic, who are seeking to win a vast continent from the toils of priest and parson craft to the higher life and brighter hope of Rationalism.

To publish a book of this kind was an undertaking as bold as its literary conception was stupendous; and to the enterprising company whose name appears on its title-page every credit is due for the manner in which they have executed the printing and the binding of the book. The hundred and forty-one portraits with which the work is embellished are, for the most part, equal in appearance to the best-executed cabinet photography. We say for the most part, because there are one or two exceptions—frightful blemishes—which very materially mar the whole collection. The portrait of Mr. G. W. Foote is the worst in the book; and surely a much better portrait of Mr. Bradlaugh could have been found to grace its pages. The other portraits of Englishmen are good, in many cases excellent. The pity is the number is so small. Surely it would have added immeasurably to the value and the interest of the collection, both to Americans and Englishmen, to have presented, in a work of this kind, the faces of Bentham, Buckle, the Mills, Grote, Clifford, Lecky, Lewes, Lyell, Froude, Leslie Stephen, John Morley, George Eliot, Laing, Otter Morison, and Clodd, to mention but a few of our great Freethinkers of the nineteenth century. May we venture to hope that, should the book reach a second edition—and we trust it may—something will be done to repair these, to us, unfortunate omissions?

To attempt anything like a sketch of the contents of this bulky volume is here obviously impossible. Mr. Putnam has sought to traverse the whole field of thought and secular activity from 1492 to 1892. Only those who stand at the end of these crowded centuries, says he, can realize the advancing greatness of humanity. "What lofty intellects adorn the way! What inspiring music is poured forth! What radiant discoveries on earth and in heaven are there! What vast inventions! What gigantic powers! It is like looking upon the splendors of the dawn, ever accumulating as the day advances." Mr. Putnam does not, of course, pretend to have done more than touch upon the main features of the history of intellectual progress. His endeavor has been to interpret that history by personalities rather than by events, for, as he says, "it is in personalities that we see the heights and depths of human life, that we witness the trend of civilization." He does not attempt to give the daily history of man, but simply what may be regarded as the history of man's highest moments. While admitting that there have been many philosophers, poets, heroes, martyrs, discoverers, and inventors whose achievements have vastly benefited the world, he finds that it would be somewhat out of place to mention their names and their works in a book of this kind, which is intended to embrace only those superior minds who have been the grand interpreters of the age in which they lived.

Here we have the story of the long and bitter struggle between truth and falsehood, reason and superstition, mental freedom and ecclesiastical tyranny; and here we have told how truth triumphed, reason asserted its supremacy, and the forces of intellectual liberty routed those of priestly despotism. As we turn over the pages of this book we read the names and admire the achievements of those who fought with tongue and pen, suffered persecution and sometimes death, that the world might be freed of that oppressive weight of superstition and dogma, which, under the rule of holy church, was crushing the manhood, brutalizing the nobler instincts, and blasting the aspirations of nations. The story is one full of encouragement to those who are fighting against error and falsehood in our own day; and to the ordinary reader, for whose benefit this book has been written and published, it should prove not only a source of en-

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons have subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might have been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type have reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits have proved the most expensive—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractive—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will give the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

"A Tale of a Halo." By Morgan A. Robertson. Illustrated by A. Cary K. Jurist. New York: The Truth Seeker Co. 50 c.; cloth, $1. A really clever satire on the "Catholic" doctrine of the supremacy of the church, evidently the work of a man of considerable literary ability. It is well written and vivid; the "Careykjurist" has done his part with spirit, and, as the press-work is good, the pamphlet is quite a handsome one. The ridiculous light in which heaven, angels, and saints are portrayed, will, however, alienate the sympathies of many who have no more belief in the subjects of Mr. Robertson's ridicule, as literal realities, than he himself has, but who have retained a reverence for what are symbols of religious truth to many of their brethren. We should like to see some of Mr. Robertson's work on a different subject. —F. W. S., in Unity.

This volume, "Religion and the Bible," by F. D. Cummings, forms No. 43 (price fifty cents) of the Truth Seeker Library. Mr. Cummings has devoted his attention for many years to an examination of matters pertaining to religion and the Bible, and here presents us with the results. The author modestly says he does not pretend his book will unlock every door and reveal all truth, but he hopes it may be a light on the way—that it may help. We believe it will help considerably, and recommend it to every one who can afford the necessary fifty cents. —Secular Thought.

A Tale of a Halo is a highly flippant piece of verse by A. Cary K. Jurist, descriptive of the adventures within the heavenly walls of a fiend. It is not good poetry, and its tone is in very bad taste. In no way is it likely to help on the cause of its author, who is apprehensive of the effect, on our institutions, of the machinations of the Catholic church. The Truth Seeker Company publish it. —Boston Commonwealth.

"The Better World." By E. B. Southwick, M.D. Truth Seeker Co., New York, 28 Lafayette place. This book gives evidences of a better mode of living this life, and more satisfactorily, both to the world and to self. Those who read it will be benefited, physically, mentally, and morally. Its tendency is to elevate the mind above credulity and promote a more independent method of reasoning. Not, however, by alienating the student from his religious convictions. If anything, it will help him, but it will clarify his mind as to the folly of blind faith without anything to bolster him up but faith. It points to a higher faith—one accompanied by knowledge.

"Religion and the Bible." F. D. Cummings, Truth Seeker Co., New York, 28 Lafayette place. The aim of this book is to study scripture logically. Its introductory speaks for it in saying, "Many men can repeat 'scripture' by the yard who do not examine it by the inch;" and, "Theology has become only another name for sophistry." The work does not condemn the intent of men, only what reason says is harmful. Moreover, it is instructive reading for the dogmatist—an eye-opener and interesting for the investigator in general. —Light of Truth.

For I dived into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

It is to be regretted that the inspiration of the inspired authors of the New Testament did not also extend to language and style.—Schopenhauer.

CONFUTATION by truth is the only suppression of error. Persecution only fans it into strength by mingling with its smoke the glow of martyrdom.—Moncure D. Conway.

THE great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is to have with them as little political connection as possible. Why entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?—George Washington.

THIS is not the liberty which we can hope, that no grievance should ever arise in the commonwealth—that let no man in this world expect; but when complaints are freely heard, deeply considered, and speedily reformed, then is the utmost bound of civil liberty obtained that wise men can look for.—Milton.

WE hear a great deal about "the vile, body," and many are encouraged by the phrase to transgress the laws of health. But nature quietly suppresses those who treat thus disrespectfully one of her highest products, and leaves the world to be peopled by the descendants of those who are not so foolish.—Herbert Spencer.

THAT, without religion, the fabric of society will hold together, and that a morality of a certain kind will be sustained by those daily relations of men which are necessary to their subsistence, is proved by the very instances cited from history of the passage of humanity through periods of skepticism.—Goldwin Smith.

THE men in cities who are the centers of energy, the driving-wheels of trade, politics, or practical arts, and the women of beauty and genius, are the children or grandchildren of farmers, and are spending the energies which their fathers' hardy, silent life accumulated in frosty furrows, in poverty, necessity, and darkness.—R. W. Emerson.

If any human soul at all
Must die the second death, must fall
Into that gulf of quenchless flame
Which keeps its victims still the same,
Unpurified as unconsumed,
To everlasting torments doomed;
Then I give God my scorn and hate,
And, turning back from heaven's gate
(Suppose me got there!), bow Adieu!
Almighty Devil, damn me too.
—James Thomson.

It is only the fact that the Bible and religion are spoken of with awe and reverence in our early days which stands in the way of our regarding them in a common-sense light. If any one were to propose, as part of education, any other subject about which there were disputes and no means of settling them—such, for instance, as the existence of Mahatmas in Tibet—all reasonable people would agree that such were not the subjects which should occupy children's minds to the exclusion of matters upon which all are agreed.—J. M. Wheeler.

WE have just ended our celebration of the discovery of America, the end of the Dark Ages, the birth of individual freedom and of proper government. We celebrated at the same time the beginning of a new epoch. The Medieval Renaissance was limited to Europe; ours will embrace all the nations of the earth. It may be that this should be considered the outgrowth and fulfillment of that which marked the end of the Middle Ages, but whether we are at the beginning of a new movement, or at the culmination of an old one, the last forty years have undoubtedly witnessed greater changes in the spirit of men's thoughts than the four centuries which had gone before.—G. Brown Goode, in Science.

How hard it is to realize the truth we often utter so lightly, that all men are brothers! The archaeological research of to-day is helping us to see that this is true of the men of all times as well as of the men of all conditions. The archaeology of to-day differs from that of an earlier generation in its larger unfolding of the common life of the men of old. We are learning that the difference in culture between ourselves and the ancient Egyptians and Assyrians is not so great but that much of the thought and feeling of their every-day life was very similar to our own. It is this fact that makes the seemingly dry and dusty Science of the Past so fascinating to the active and eminently human spirit of the time. We are entering upon a new renaissance—a renaissance not of the culture of Greece and Rome, but of that elder culture which had its seat in the Nile valley and in Mesopotamia and in the highlands and the valleys of the far East.—Unity.

VISITOR: "Johnnie, what's that awful noise in your back yard?" Rev. Amen's Youngest: "That's pa practicing his vacation cough."—Omaha Bee.

FATHER: "My daughter has mysteriously disappeared, and I have no clue." Detective: "Have you reared her carefully?" Father: "Oh, yes! She was educated in a convent, and never went out without her mother." Detective: "We'll find her. I'll go first and see if she hasn't answered a matrimonial advertisement."—Puck.

It was at a late quarterly meeting of Seventh-day Baptist churches in Wisconsin that two ministers were to present papers on the same day, and the question of precedence having arisen, Mr. A sprang to his feet and said: "I think, Brother B, ought to have the best place on the program; he is an older man than I am, and, besides, he is full of his subject." When the audience remembered that Brother B's subject was "The Devil," a cheerful smile seemed to beam around the church.

A VIRGINIA judge once visited a plantation where the darkey who met him at the gate asked him which barn he would have his horse put in. "Have you two barns?" inquired the judge. "Yes, sah," replied the darkey, "dars de ole barn, and mas'r has jes build a new one." "Where do you usually put the horses of visitors who come to see your master?" "Well, sah, if dey's Metodist's or Baptist's, we gen'rally puts 'em in de ole barn, but if dey's 'Piscopal we puts 'em in de new one." "Well, Sam, you can put my horse in the new barn; I'm a Baptist, but my horse is an Episcopalian."—The Green Bag.

HERE is a curious advertisement from the Daily Advertiser of December 8, 1797: "Wanted—For a wine merchant's house in the city, as porter, an athletic man of a serious countenance, a good character, and the Lady Huntingdon's persuasion. Must attend prayers twice a day, and divine service four times on Sunday; be able to bear confinement; have the fear of God before his eyes; and be able to carry two hundredweight. Wages fourteen shillings a week and find himself. N.B.—A Yorkshireman will not be objected to, but no Irishman will be accepted. Apply tomorrow at 1 o'clock, to T. F., at No. 14 Philpot lane."

A POPULAR English Nonconformist minister was staying with a family in Glasgow while on a visit to that city, whither he had gone on a deputation from the Wesleyan Missionary Society. At dessert, when invited to take some fine fruit which he declined, he mentioned to the family a curious circumstance concerning himself—he had never in his life tasted an apple, pear, grape, or any other kind of green fruit. This fact caused considerable amazement to most of the family, but a cousin who was present—a cautious Scotchman of a most practical turn of mind—listened to the statement with great unconcern, and when the various exclamations which it had aroused, subsided, he remarked dryly: "It's a great peety ye hadna been in Paradise, and there might na hae been any fa'."

THE First Corps, commanded by Gen. Reynolds, was reviewed by the president on a beautiful plain at the north of the Potomac creek, about eight miles from Hooker's headquarters. We rode hither in an ambulance over a rough corduroy road, and as we passed over some of the more difficult portions of the jolting way, the ambulance driver, who sat well in front, occasionally let fly a volley of suppressed oaths at his wild team of six mules. Finally Mr. Lincoln, leaning forward, touched the man on the shoulder, and said: "Excuse me, my friend, are you an Episcopalian?" The man, greatly startled, looked round, and replied: "No, Mr. President; I am a Methodist." "Well," said Lincoln, "I thought you must be an Episcopalian, because you swear just like Governor Seward, who is a church-warden."—Century.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed, you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces. We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free. F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O. "I dinna haud wi' comy-tees mysel'," replied Meg, "it's juist haein' money maisters, ilka yin mair cankersome and thrawn than anither!" "Weel, gin this cogs be true, an' the auld deil's deed at last, there's a heap o' fowk in this parish should be mentioned in his wull," said Jock Gordon, significantly. But the herd was a stanch Marrow man. He was not led away by any human criticism, nor yet by the new theology. "New licht here, new licht there," he said. "I canna' pairt wi' ma deil. Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the Church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

By the census of 1893, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies. $1.00

One hundred copies. 8.00

THE French ministry resigned on Jan. 14 as the result of a vote adverse to the government which followed a discussion on the railways' guaranteed interest. The next day Casimir-Perier, president of the republic, also resigned. ON Jan. 14 the employees of the Brooklyn trolley lines went out on strike. Up to this time all attempts to settle the differences between the companies and the men by arbitration have failed, except in the case of one system. In some instances non-union men were roughly handled and the lines were blocked. To preserve order Mayor Schieren called out the Second Brigade of militia (of Brooklyn) about the middle of last week, the police force of the city being unable to cope with the crowds and guard cars manned by new motormen. On Sunday, Jan. 20, the mayor, after consulting with the labor leaders, who were willing to arbitrate, and the officials of the car lines, who refused to do so, wired to the governor for more troops to assist in preserving order. The First Brigade (this city) was thereupon put under arms, making a total of some 7,000 troops. On Monday, as on the two preceding days, trolley wires were cut all over the city faster than the seven hundred linemen of the companies could repair them, tracks were blocked, car windows smashed, and non-union men, policemen, and soldier stoned and fired on, while the militia also did much shooting. The Board of Aldermen voted unanimously that the companies must not hire men from outside of Brooklyn, and at the same time asked the attorney-general to begin action against the trolley companies for the annulment of their charters, on the ground of failure to run their cars.

Boycotting the Sunday Newspapers.

The Christian Statesman has entered upon a “practical” crusade against the Sunday paper; it is going to crush it by building up the business of those publishers who, from conscientious convictions, refuse to issue Sunday editions of their papers, and of those advertisers who decline, because of their religious scruples, to advertise in the Sunday papers. This application of the principle of the peaceful boycott is perfectly legitimate, whatever we may think of the narrowness of the minds that can suggest and practicalize it, and it is an infinitely more decent way of combating what the Sabbatharians regard as an evil than is the attempt to suppress the Sunday newspaper by law. But we apprehend that they will have their labor for their pains. When matters have reached such a stage that with few exceptions the only dailies of importance not issuing Sunday editions are those unable to secure the requisite franchises, it is not likely that there is a sufficiently strong Sunday sentiment among the buyers of daily papers to make the proposed boycott of the Sunday newspaper and the Sunday advertiser a success. Why we italicize the “buyers of daily papers” will appear further along. The Statesman mentions the names of two dailies in Pittsburg which do not get out a Sunday issue, in spite of “the strong temptation to increase their profits” by joining the ranks of the “Sabbath desecrators.” If this is the best that can be said for the strength of the Sunday sentiment in Pittsburg, there certainly does not seem to be much hope for the success of the boycotting scheme fathered by the Christian Statesman. If in Pittsburg and Allegheny, the headquarters of the God-in-the-Constitution and Sabbatharian movements, and the hotbeds of theocratic sentiment, there is a “strong temptation” for the Christian owners of dailies to “increase their profits” by violating their conscientious convictions and issuing Sunday editions, what must be the state of the public mind in those cities? Does it not appear that even there, where there are already at least five Sunday papers, and where the publishers of those papers have been mulcted in sums to the amount of thousands of dollars for their violation of the Sunday law of the state and of Allegheny county—we repeat, does it not appear that even in those priest-ridden cities the demand for the Sunday paper is so strong that that kind of a journal is a paying investment, despite all the difficulties against which those papers are forced to contend? Under such circumstances, will a boycott avail to stop their presses, and if it will not accomplish the end sought, in Pittsburg and Allegheny, in the state of Pennsylvania, will it do it in the freer and more progressive cities and states of the Union? Evidently it will be a failure.

What, then, is the only hope of the Sabbatharians in their fight against the Sunday paper? The law, assuredly. But, it will be asked, if they cannot boycott the Sunday newspaper out of existence, how can they vote it out when, as it would seem, the buyers are the voters? The answer was indicated when we italicized the words, “buyers of daily papers,” in the preceding paragraph. Only a fraction of the voters read the daily papers; it is in the country districts that the Sabbatharian strength is found, among the villagers and the farmers. The daily has not become an important element in their lives, and they do not see why others should have what they have not felt the need of in their business. As always, the rural population is the conservative and reactionary factor, as compared with the urban. It is not its fault, but its misfortune, the result of unfavorable environment. It is, to a certain extent, cut off from the nerve and brain centers of the world. Governor Fishback of Arkansas recently told a committee of ministers: “The largest amount of enlightenment of the world always has been and always will be in its cities.” But the bicycle and the electric railway are rapidly changing all this. Every improvement in country roads, every extension of the electric lines, is a blow at the priest. The theocrat must get his repressive measures adopted soon or it will be too late. Civilization flies over the country with the pneumatic tire and flashes its light from the wires of the trolley.

An Open Letter to the Legislators of New York.

Gentlemen: There are upon the statute books of this state certain laws forbidding work and recreation on the first day of the week, usually called Sunday. These statutes make occupations and amusements that are legitimate on other days of the week misdemeanors if engaged in on Sunday.

These statutes were enacted by or at the behest of the adherents of a religious system known as Christianity.

They were placed on the statute books in the interest of that religious system, that its teachers might not be put in competition with secular duties and attractions on the day named. This legislation is essentially and ineradicably monopolistic and was intended to be such by those who secured its adoption. It is legislation distinctly and indisputably discriminative in favor of those who hold to a certain form of religious belief and was intended by its promoters to be that and that only.

They are in violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the state of New York, of the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, and of the genius of our free institutions. In theory there is absolute separation of church and state in this country, and there must be absolute separation in fact. The time has come to put into universal practice the fundamental principles that underlie the institutions of this republic and of the states of which it is composed. The Constitution of this commonwealth declares that “the free exercise of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed in this state to all mankind.” It needs no argument to show that there can be no real religious freedom for all the citizens of the state so long as the freedom not to worship is denied; and this freedom is denied by the Sunday laws of New York. They protect the Sabbath-keeper in the exercise of his right to make such use of Sunday as he desires to make, but they brand as a misdemeanor and punish the non-Sabbath-keeper who exercises his right to make such use of Sunday as he desires to make. What can this truthfully be called but statutory “discrimination” and “preference” in favor of the accepters of a religious dogma? And is it not equally statutory discrimination against the rejecters of that dogma? Certainly it is, and it is, as already shown, a discrimination forbidden by the basic law of the state.

Is the Sunday law needed? Not by the people at large. The protection of property, person, liberty, and life should be and can be secured by general laws applicable to all the days of the week alike. There is not the slightest necessity for special statutes for Sunday. What is wrong on one day is wrong on all days, and that which is not an offense on six days cannot become a crime or misdemeanor on the other day of the week. It is as criminal to punish a man for working on Sunday or engaging in recreation thereon as it would be to punish him for working or amusing himself on the Fourth of July or Thanksgiving day. We are not unaware of the pretense that Sunday laws are needed to prevent the “laborer” from being overworked, but it has not been observed that he is overworked on secular holidays because of the absence of laws making labor and recreation on those days misdemeanors. The danger is not that men will be driven beyond their strength, but that we shall find ourselves under the absolute dominion of a church which will force us to abstain from labor on many more holy days than Sunday. In other lands and past ages so large a portion of time was dedicated to the exclusive use of religion that industry was seriously crippled and the administration of justice made a mockery. In the year 425 the emperors Theodosius and Valentinian set aside not only Sunday but the days of the nativity and Epiphany, and the days of Pentecost and Easter. In the Codex Justin we find that from the tenth calends of September to the ides of October (the feast of the vintage), Easter, the day of the nativity, the day of the Epiphany, the seven days preceding and the seven days following each, were made dies non. In 858 Pope Nicholas I. instructed the Burgundians that they should abstain from all except works of necessity on Sunday, the “feasts of the Virgin, the feasts of the Apostles and Evangelists, the birthdays of other saints, and the season of lent.” The lands most backward in civilization to-day are those which have the greatest number of days devoted to religion and idleness. Leave all men free to choose their own rest days in harmonious coöperation with their fellow-laborers. In our civilization it is absolutely necessary, if the masses of the people are to rest and enjoy themselves in amusements on a certain day, that the minority work on that day. How can the great body of the workers make a rational use of any rest day if the libraries and museums and galleries are closed, the transit facilities available on other days denied to them in their hours of leisure, and the sale of necessities and luxuries forbidden? Yet the very meddlers who are trying to justify the existence of Sunday laws on the plea of "rest" are the only people who want to keep the citizen shut up on Sunday, opening the door of his prison just long enough for him to attend their religious services. Is not this fact vastly significant? Take down the sectarian bars; leave the people free to work out their own worldly and spiritual salvation. They know much better what they want than does the minister or the legislator. They will settle the "rest" question. It will be discovered that it is very easy to so arrange the periods of labor and of leisure that all will have the opportunity to enjoy the latter. There is not the slightest necessity for special liberty-denying, constitution-defying legislation in the interest of either barbers or preachers. Permit us, in connection with this, to call your attention to some excerpts from a decision of the Supreme Court of California:

"Now, when we come to inquire what reason can be given for the claim of power to enact a Sunday law, we are told, looking at it in its purely civil aspect, that it is absolutely necessary for the benefit of his [the individual's] health and the restoration of his powers, and in aid of this great social necessity, the legislature may, for the general convenience, set apart a particular day of rest, and require its observance by all.

"This argument is founded on the assumption that men are in the habit of working too much, and thereby entailing evil upon society; and that, without compulsion, they will not seek the necessary repose which their exhausted natures demand. This to us is a new theory, and is contradicted by the history of the past and the observation of the present. We have heard, in all ages, of declamations and reproaches against the vice of indolence; but we have yet to learn that there has ever been any general complaint of an intemperate, vicious, unhealthy, or morbid industry. On the contrary, we know that men seek cessation from toil, from the natural influences of self-preservation, in the same manner and as certainly as they seek slumber, relief from pain, or food to appease their hunger."

The court might pertinently have said that if men need laws to prevent them from working excessively during the day, they, many of them, much more need laws to prevent them from working during the night, for there can be no question that night labor is more exhausting than is labor performed during the hours of natural light. But we have not heard that any Sabbatarian proposes to forbid night work, solicitous as he claims he is for the welfare of the "helpless victim of soulless capital." The plain truth is, he is working, not for the people, but for the church, that is, for his own guild, and it should always be borne in mind that he, if a minister, has no scruples against earning his living by Sunday work. A few words more from the California decision:

"It may well be considered that the amount of rest which would be required by one-half of society may be widely disproportionate to that required by the other. It is a matter of which each individual must be permitted to judge for himself, according to his own instincts and necessities."

This is the terse expression of a bed-rock truth, and we ask for it your unprejudiced consideration. Right here it may be well to say that all that will be necessary in the way of legislation—if anything is, which we very much doubt—to prevent employers denying to their employees a day of rest each week will be a law making six days constitute a week's work, leaving to each workman full liberty to arrange with his fellow-workmen and his employer as to what day he will take off, and also leaving him free to work more than six days if that is his pleasure. Nothing less than this is worthy the name of American liberty. Now we will quote a few observations on the constitutionality of Sunday laws, from the opinion rendered in the California case:

"As a general rule, it will be admitted that men have a natural right to do anything which their inclinations may suggest, if it be not evil in itself, and in no way impairs the rights of others. . . . The right to protect and possess property is not more clearly protected by the Constitution than the right to acquire. The right to acquire must include the right to use the proper means to attain the end. The right itself would be impotent without the power to use its necessary incidents. The legislature, therefore, cannot prohibit the proper use of the means of acquiring property, except the peace and safety of the state require it."

It is needless to say that the peace and safety of the state do not require that Sunday acquirement of property and Sunday recreation be forbidden, as they are in many instances by the law of New York. All men are supposed to be equal in rights under the laws of the United States and of the state whose law-making body you are. All men not suffering imprisonment for crime have an equal right to make use of their time for the acquisition of property. You have no more authority to deprive them of the use of part of their time than you have to deprive them of the use of it altogether. This is self-evident.

ORIGIN OF THE WEEK AND SABBATHS.

The week is of lunar origin. Some tribes measure time only by moons. Others have evolved a lunar year composed of a certain number of lunar months. The solar year does not appear until some advance in civilization has been made. The moon, or month, is reckoned from the first appearance of the new moon. As the moon is seen only at night, generally speaking, so a month was computed by nights rather than by days. Hence our "fortnight," fourteen nights, and the old name of the week, "sen'night," seven nights. The next step was to divide the moon into periods corresponding to its changes, and the usual subdivisions were halves and quarters. We still speak of the "quarters" of the moon. But twenty-nine and one-half days will not divide exactly by two or by four, and thus each period would consist of seven days and about nine hours. The Tshi tribes of the Gold Coast of Africa have such a week, which begins at a different hour of the day at each recurrence. The suffix da, attached to the names of the days of this tribe, is derived from the verb da, "to sleep," and shows that we have here a seven night, instead of a seven day, period. The Ga tribes of the Gold Coast have the same week, the days differently named, but it is derived, like the other, directly from the lunar month. The succeeding step in time reckoning is by the year. But twelve or thirteen lunar months do not exactly correspond in duration with the solar year. This leads to compromises which generally result either in the dropping of computation by moons or to the arbitrary fixing of the moon (month) as composed of so many days, regardless of the changes of the planet. This is a civil measure of time, having only the relation of name to the lunar month. Following this comes the application of the same process to the subdivisions of the month. As the month became a civil period having no relation to the moon, so the week became a civil period having no relation to the lunar month. The week no longer marks the phases of the moon, the odd hours having been dropped, and all weeks commencing at the same hour.

We trace the lunar month and week among the Aztecs, the Society Islanders, the Sofalese, the Siamese, the Javanese, and many other nations and tribes, the month being from twenty-eight to thirty days in length. All seem to have reckoned by nights, as, indeed, was inevitable, the moon being a night luminary, and the Italians and Bohemians still reckon the day of twenty-four hours from sunset to sunset. As the Israelites had a seven-day week and measured time by moons and nights, it is apparent that their week was in the first instance a subdivision of the lunar month. A new month began when the new moon appeared, and they reckoned their day from sunset to sunset. Their lunar year was twelve months in length, and every two or three years an intercalary month was added to bring it into agreement with the solar year. Their present luni-solar year was not introduced until 360 of this era. The Chaldeans had a week which was evidently a subdivision originally of the lunar month, and they had divided their day into twenty-four hours, and subsequently dedicated each of these to one of the seven planets from which some of the present names of our days are derived, in the order of the magnitude of the orbits of the planets, the day receiving its name from the planet to which its first hour was sacred. Egypt had a seven-day period, and the sixth-seventh day was sacred to the moon when the Chaldean order was introduced, while with the Chaldeans it was the third. The Chaldean seven-day period came into Rome through Egypt early in the first century of this era, but does not appear to have been adopted by the Romans until nearly the beginning of the fifth century. Colonel Ellis thinks that it is "fairly clear that in the early days of their history they reckoned time by half-moons and quarter-moons or lunar weeks," and it is certain that when "they had invented civil months the calends were invariably on the first day of the month, and were so named because the priests had been accustomed to call the people together on that day and announce what days were to be kept sacred during the month." Further examining the Roman system, Colonel Ellis concludes:

"We think, then, that the system of calends, nones, and ides dated from a period when time was reckoned from lunar months, and was really a system of half-moons and quarter-moons, the nones falling on the night of the seventh-eighth, and the ides on that of the fourteenth-fifteenth, which brings us very near to the system of the Tshi and Ga tribes. The introduction of civil months destroyed the connection between the calends, nones, and ides and the phases of the moon; and the lunar week became a civil week of seven days, and finally the names for the days of the week were adopted from Egypt."

Thus it is shown that the origin of the week was purely natural and human. There is nothing miraculous or supernatural about it in any way. Neither was one-seventh part of it made a "Sabbath" because it was thought that man needed just that proportion of the week for rest, for some tribes divided the lunar month into weeks of seven days, some into weeks of five days, while others had a four-day week, and still others one of ten days. The seven-day week appears to have been the most common, that is all. In connection with the "Sabbath" feature of the Sunday question we wish to direct your particular attention to the very able article of Colonel A. B. Ellis in the Popular Science Monthly for January. You will find some excerpts from it on another page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Don't fail to read them.

THE SUNDAY LAW BREEDS CORRUPTION AND BLACKMAIL.

The Sunday statutes should be unconditionally repealed. They are out of date. They subserve no useful purpose. They protect the rights of no citizen. They are an insult to every free American, implying, as they do, that he is either an imbecile or a blackguard, that he is either incapable of taking care of himself or of respecting the equal rights of his neighbors on one day in every seven. They directly interfere with the pleasure or the business, or both, of hundreds of thousands of the inhabitants of the state and indirectly with the happiness of all its citizens, including that of the preachers themselves, who are working so hard for their retention; for the wider the liberty, the greater the prosperity, the more unqualified the happiness, of any class of the people of a state the better it is for all the people of that state. Is any church stronger to-day because in past ages she persecuted her opponents? No. Will the present Christian church gain anything in the long run by her enforcement of antiquated Sunday laws? No, she will earn only the contempt or hatred of those she persecutes to-day and of all observers who love fair play, and the loathing or, at best, the pity, of the enlightened generations to come. Repeal the Sunday laws, for they unite church and state, they deny liberty, they rob the citizen, they make a hollow mockery of all our professions of justice.

Repeal the Sunday laws. They are the source of corruption, of police blackmail, of the oppression of the weak and the purchased immunity of the powerful. Repeal the Sunday laws. "They are not enforced, they cannot be enforced, they should not be enforced." The people do not want them; they will evade them whenever they can, for, no matter what their nominal opinions may be concerning religion and Sabbaths, they feel instinctively, and rightly, that Sunday statutes are an impertinent interference with their natural, equal, constitution-guaranteed right to attend to their own affairs in their own way at their own cost. It is only the distinctively "criminal class" that will deliberately violate those social laws which make for the protection of property, person, and life, but about the only persons who at all times willingly obey the Sunday laws are those devout people who believe that their God will roast them forever in hell if they are so wicked as to do a stroke of work (outside the church) or engage in innocent secular recreation on Sunday. The more enlightened the people become the less will they be inclined to obey these sixteenth century edicts and, consequently, the more rapidly will the police captains and inspectors amass fortunes at the expense of those who cater to the Sunday wants of their fellow-citizens. Mayor Strong told a committee which waited upon him to urge the retention and enforcement of the law forbidding liquor selling on Sunday that "the investigation by the Lexow Committee revealed that the present excise law was the foundation and cause of most of the criminality exposed." No careful observer of current events can doubt that the mayor of New York is substantially right, and you will bear in mind that the excise law is thus productive of corruption and criminality because it is a Sunday law, a statute drafted for the purpose of preventing the sale of articles on Sunday that are allowed to be sold on all the other days of the week. However, this is but one of the features of it which condemn it in the eyes of fair-minded men and women. The laws against fishing and other forms of recreation are violated with almost equal frequency, and a surveillance is exercised over other Sunday amusements that is annoying and costly to the victims of it, and degrading to the officers who do the unwholesome work. Besides all this the contempt for law which this wholesale violation of certain statutes inevitably breeds is destructive of the bonds of society; some men who become accustomed to trampling under foot or seeing others trample under foot needless and invasive statutes cannot readily discriminate, and so with them it is an easy step to the violation of laws which conserve, under healthful social conditions, the most precious rights of the individual. The Sunday law is itself a crime against the citizen and it is the prolific cause of other crimes. Repeal it, and at once. That way lies liberty, and therefore justice and safety.

"Liberty for Man, Woman and Child," and the Tribute to Ebon C. Ingersoll.

So many have wanted the lecture on Liberty, and also the tribute to Colonel Ingersoll's brother, that Mr. Farrell has had them printed in one pamphlet, uniform with the other lectures and at the same price—25 cents. And he has added as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it.

This lecture on liberty for the women and children has made many converts to rationalism among the fairer portion of humanity, and it is the best one to give to the good women who have a prejudice—fostered by the ministers—against the Colonel because he has "taken away their savior." When they read this they usually revise their opinion of the apostle of liberty, and read his other works—which they wouldn't look at before. If you know a good Christian girl, any age, just give her a copy of this lecture. Postpaid, 25 cents.

Great Reductions in Standard Freethought Works.

The popularity of our missionary scheme, by which Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is being scattered broadcast by the thousands, has induced us to lower the price of his other works, with the hope that they too will have a wider reading. From this date the prices of Paine's books will be as follows:

AGE OF REASON. Paper, 25 cents. Eight copies sent to as many different addresses for $1. Cloth, 50 cents.

EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Paper, 15 cents.

COMMON SENSE. The argument that did more than any other to convince the Revolutionary leaders of the necessity of the separation of this country from Great Britain. Paper, 15 cents.

THE CRISIS. Paine's great Revolutionary writings. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Answer to Burke's attack on the French Revolution. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PAINE'S GREAT WORKS IN ONE VOLUME. 8vo., 800 pp., cloth, $3, leather $4, morocco, gilt edges, $4.50. This book and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $5.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. One volume containing Common Sense, Crisis, and Rights of Man. Cloth, $1.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. One volume containing Age of Reason, Examination of the Prophecies, Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff, Essay on Dreams, Letters, etc. With Life of Paine and steel portrait. Cloth, $1.

We hope all our readers will do their best to scatter these splendid works all over the country.

By the death of B. F. Gove, of De Witt, Iowa, the Freethinkers of Clinton county lose one of their most earnest and reliable comrades, the Liberals of the state a fellow-worker who was unobtrusively uncompromising in his devotion to principle, and the great army of reform a soldier who never shirked a duty or deserted a brother who needed help. Tall, angular, quaint, he was in appearance a typical New Englander, with all the tenacity of purpose of that people and free from the superstitions and intolerance that mar its character. He commanded the respect of all who knew him and who can appreciate true manhood; he laid down the burdens of existence without fear and in the last hour showed that Freethought is a logic alike of life and of death to those who intelligently accept it. We grieve that he died so early, but we rejoice that he lived so nobly.

How important they think they are in the economy of God, these Christian ministers! Here is Rev. C. W. Savidge, of Omaha, who preached a sermon the other Sunday which he advertised under the title of "God Closed My Mouth to Open My Eyes." The subject related to a debate he had with a Mormon elder the week before, in which, as he was denying the divinity of the Mormon religion, he became speechless. As he had never before had any trouble in overcoming an antagonist in the forensic arena, as he looks at the outcome of his discussions, he is sure that God wants him to quit fighting the Mormons and Christian Scientists, and so he has promised to let them alone hereafter. Probably he is afraid that his god will hit him harder next time if he does not heed this warning. Prudence is a very desirable quality. But what a pity it is that God does not send a warning to some of the Constitution tinkers of Pennsylvania!

The Sunday law issue is one of the chief subjects of newspaper discussion in this state at present. Now is the opportunity to make the people acquainted with sound principles; let us push the fight to the utmost limit possible. Since our last acknowledgments were made, the following sums have been received for the work before the legislature and among the people of New York: C. C. de Rudio, $1; John J. Riser, $1; Dexter K. Cole, $5; A. V. Hendricks, $5.

KISSIMMEE, FLA., Jan. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I will give a dollar toward the expense in the Fleckten case in Minnesota—and more if necessary. Respectfully, A. J. GARDNER.

That is good, and we hope that now the ball is started Mr. Fleckten will receive all that is needed to make such a fight as will drive religious teachings out of the common schools of Minnesota.

When Mrs. Grannis and her committee visited Mayor Strong the other day to try to prevail upon him to enforce the existing Sunday excise law and promise not to ask for its repeal, she told him that he should call in "the wise councils of the church" to aid him, and at the same time protested against his consulting with the liquor dealers. Now why should the church more than the liquor dealers be permitted to advise how the city government should be run? The evils that flow from the consumption of intoxicants can all cheerfully be conceded, and the wise citizen will still prefer the political saloon keeper to the political preacher. We know what the church has been, what the saloon is, and what the church wants to be again; and preying the future from the past and present we don't want the "wise councils of the church" to dictate our legislation. The alleged possible alternative is far less terrifying. But we need not be ruled by either church or saloon. Away with the Sunday laws and let liberty cleanse and uplift.

The God-in-the-Constitution schemers are very busy this winter. Among the meetings recently held by them was one at Superior, Nebraska. It is reported to have been "remarkably successful" and "enthusiasm ran high." The Covenanter synod asks for $7,000 for National Reform work, and it is expected that the sum will be raised without the necessity of sending out a special appeal. If one, and that a comparatively small, Christian church can raise this amount for the purpose of destroying the free institutions of the nation, how much should the Freethinkers of America be able to contribute for the preservation of the liberties for which the founders of the republic gave all they had to offer on the battlefields of freedom? What will each Liberal do to help furnish the Federation and Union with the imperatively necessary means of defense? This is no dress parade campaign in which we are engaged. It is a struggle to the death with an enemy of liberty and justice which has never been known to give quarter to a vanquished foe or to respect the rights of man when it had strength to ravish them.

In the village of Starai-Moultani, Russia, eleven persons known as "Votiaks" were accused of offering up a human sacrifice to their god Kourbane. The evidence showed that in order to prevent the recurrence of famine they had inveigled a beggar into a house and cut his throat. He was then decapitated; his headless body was hung up and five cuts made in it, the blood being caught in dishes. The heart and lungs were taken out to be used in the "idolatrous" rites. Eight of the accused were sentenced to prison for life or deported to Siberia. One was seventy years old. Before our Christian brethren say too much about this "heathen" performance it will be well for them to take a careful survey of their own doctrines. They should remember that the patriarch Abraham earned his title of "The Father of the Faithful," if there is any truth in the story, because he was willing to make a human sacrifice to his god of his son Isaac. And the whole scheme of redemption accepted by the Christian rests on the god-premeditated and accomplished sacrifice of a being asserted to be half god and half man; and to-day the Christian on certain stated occasions eats and drinks what are called the flesh and blood of this sacrificial victim. The oldest of the Christian churches, and the most powerful, teaches that the bread and wine so eaten and drank are actually the substance of this crucified man-god. How far is the enlightened Christian in advance of the semi-savage Tartar of the Russian steppes? And is there no direct and immediate connection between the Christian rite of communion and the Votiaks? Did not the latter borrow something from their Christian neighbors or do the two superstitions hark back to a common source? The observant reader will have noticed that five wounds were made in the body of the beggar and the blood drawn therefrom. Who has not heard sung the Christian hymn containing this line,

"Five bleeding wounds he bore," and who does not recall the sermons he has heard in which it was declared that "the blood, the blood," possessed a marvelous and magical potency for the washing away of sin and the salvation of souls? It is pueril and useless for Christians to declaim against the "sacrifice of blood" when their entire system is bottomed flatly on that very "sacrifice of blood."

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895 is great. Price, 25 cents.

Benjamin Franklin: Was He a Christian?

"I soon became a thorough Deist."—Franklin.

The world has produced few wiser or better men than our American Socrates, Benjamin Franklin. While he lived he was loved and honored by all; when he died, two continents mourned as a child mourns the loss of a beloved father. Eagerly has the church striven to place to her credit the prestige of this wise and good man's name. But in vain; she cannot efface the oft-repeated declarations of his disbelief.

Franklin received a religious training, but his good sense and his human nature forced him to rebel against the irrational and inhuman tenets of his parents' faith, and at an early age a spirit of skepticism was developed in him, as the following extracts from his Autobiography will show:

"My parents had given me betimes religious impressions, and I received from my infancy a pious education in the principles of Calvinism. But scarcely was I arrived at fifteen years of age, when, after having doubted in turn of different tenets, according as I found them combated in the different books that I read, I began to doubt of revelation itself" (Autobiography, p. 66).

He read much, and the ambition of his youth, as he declares, was to become a decent writer of the English language. His favorite exercise was to reproduce, in his own words, the ideas of the authors he read. Alluding to this, he says:

"The time which I devoted to these exercises, and to reading, was the evening after my day's labor was finished, the morning before it began, and Sundays when I could escape divine service. While I lived with my father, he had insisted on my punctual attendance on public worship, and I still indeed considered it as a duty, but a duty which I thought I had no time to practice" (Ibid. p. 16).

In the course of his mental pursuits he read Locke on the "Human Understanding," and carefully studied some essays which taught the Socratic method of disputation, which he immediately put to use in combating superstition:

"Charmed to a degree of enthusiasm with this mode of disputing, I adopted it, and renouncing blunt contradictions, and direct and positiv argument, I assumed the character of a humble questioner. The perusal of Shaftesbury and Collins had made me a skeptic; and, being previously so as to many doctrines of Christianity, I found Socrates' method to be both the safest for myself, as well as the most embarrassing to those against whom I applied it. It soon afforded me singular pleasure; I incessantly practiced it; and became very adroit in obtaining, even from persons of superior understanding, concessions of which they did not foresee the consequence" (Ibid. p. 17).

The result of his many disputes upon the subject of religion is easily divined. He says:

"I began to be regarded, by pious souls, with horror, either as an apostate or an Atheist" (Ibid. p. 22).

Being associated with an elder brother in the publication of the New England Courant, young Franklin made use of its columns to propagate his radical thoughts. From an old edition of Goodrich's Reader (Fifth, pp. 273, 274) I quote the following relative to his adventures in this field of religious criticism:

"In Boston, in 1721, when the pulpit had marshaled Quakers and witches to the gallows, one newspaper, the New England Courant, the fourth American periodical, was established as an organ of independent opinion, by James Franklin. Its temporary success was advanced by Benjamin, his brother and apprentice, a boy of fifteen, who wrote pieces for its humble columns.

"The little sheet satirized hypocrisy and spoke of religious knaves as of all knaves the worst. This was described as tending 'to abuse the ministers of religion in a manner which was intolerable.' 'I can well remember,' writes Increase Mather, then more than four score years of age, 'when the civil government would have taken an effectual course to suppress such a cursed libel.'

"The ministers persevered; and, in January, 1723, a committee of inquiry was raised by the legislature. Benjamin Franklin, being examined, escaped with an admonition; James, the publisher, refusing to discover the author of the offense, was kept in jail for a month; his paper was censured as reflecting injuriously on the reverend ministers of the gospel; and, by a vote of the House and Council, he was forbidden to print it, 'except it be first supervised.'

This young opponent of priestcraft soon after left Boston, went to New York, and from thence to Philadelphia. In passing through New Jersey he stopped at an inn near Burlington, kept by a Dr. Brown. Of this Dr. Brown, he writes as follows:

"This man entered into a conversation with me while I took some refreshment, and perceiving that I had read a little, he expressed toward me considerable interest and friendship. Our acquaintance continued during the remainder of his life. I believe him to have been what is called an itinerant doctor; for there was no town in England, or indeed in Europe, of which he could not give a particular account. He was neither deficient in understanding nor literature, but he was a sad Infidel; and, some years after, wickedly undertook to travesty the Bible, in burlesque verse, as Cotton has travestied Virgil. He exhibited, by this means, many facts in a very ludicrous point of view, which would have given umbrage to weak minds, had this work been published, which it never was" (Autobiography, p. 25).

I can see the sly twinkle in Benjamin's eye as he writes about this "sad Infidel" who "wickedly undertook to travesty the Bible." It was with these same "sad Infidels" that he delighted to associate throughout his life, while many a time he, too, "wickedly undertook to travesty the Bible" by pretending to read from it, extemporized in a ludicrous manner as he went along. (Parton's Life of Franklin, vol. i, p. 320.)

In Philadelphia he was associated with a printer named Keimer. Referring to Keimer, he says:

"He formed so high an opinion of my talents for refutation that he seriously proposed to me to become his colleague in the establishment of a new religious sect. He was to propagate the doctrine by preaching, and I to refute every opponent.

"When he explained to me his tenets, I found many absurdities which I refused to admit. . . . Keimer wore his beard long, because Moses had somewhere said, 'Thou shalt not mar the corners of thy beard.' He likewise observed the Sabbath; and these were with him two very essential points. I disliked them both" (Autobiography, p. 40).

At a later period, alluding to his religious belief, Franklin says:

"Some volumes against Deism fell into my hands. They were said to be the substance of sermons preached at Boyle's Lecture. It happened that they produced on me an effect precisely the reverse of what was intended by the writers; for the arguments of the Deists, which were cited in order to be refuted, appeared to me much more forcibly than the refutation itself. In a word, I soon became a thorough Deist" (Ibid. p. 66).

In one of his youthful essays he professes a sort of polytheistic belief as shown by the following extracts:

"The Infinite Father expects or requires no worship or praise from us."

"I conceive, then, that the Infinite has created many beings or gods vastly superior to man."

"It may be these created gods are immortal; or it may be that, after many ages, they are changed, and others supply their places.

"Howbeit, I conceive that each of these is exceeding good and very powerful; and that each has made for himself one glorious sun, attended with a beautiful and admirable system of planets.

"It is that particular wise and good God, who is the author and owner of our system, that I propose for the object of my praise and adoration" (Franklin's Works, vol. ii, p. 2).

He subsequently rejected some of his earlier philosophical and ethical views, particularly those contained in a small pamphlet which he wrote, entitled a "Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain." Referring to his arguments in this pamphlet he says:

"The object was to prove, from the attributes of God, his goodness, wisdom, and power, that there could be no such thing as evil in the world; that vice and virtue did not in reality exist, and were nothing more than vain distinctions. I no longer regarded it as so blameless a work as I had formerly imagined; and I suspected that some error must have imperceptibly glided into my argument, by which all the inferences I had drawn from it had been affected, as frequently happens in metaphysical reasonings. In a word, I was at last convinced that truth, probity, and sincerity in transactions between man and man were of the utmost importance to the happiness of life; and I resolved from that moment, and wrote the resolution in my journal, to practice them as long as I lived" (Autobiography, pp. 66, 67).

His unbelief in Christianity, however, remained unchanged. He continues:

"Revelation, indeed, as such had no influence on my mind" (Ibid. p. 67).

I have given the theological views of Franklin's youth and early manhood; I shall next present the religious opinions of his mature manhood and old age. Less reticent than Washington, he was at the same time less radical than Jefferson, and less disposed to combat the dogmas of the church. Nevertheless, his expressed opinions are ample to show that at no time during his career was he a Christian—that he lived and died a Deist.

In a letter to the Rev. George Whitefield, written in 1753, when he was forty-seven years old, we have his opinion of Christianity:

"The faith you mention has doubtless its use in the world. I do not desire to see it diminished, nor would I desire to lessen it in any way; but I wish it were more productive of good works than I have generally seen it. I mean real good works, works of kindness, charity, mercy, and public spirit, not holy-day keeping, sermon-hearing, and reading, performing church ceremonies, or making long prayers, filled with flatteries and compliments, despised even by wise men, and much less capable of pleasing the Deity" (Works, vol. vii, p. 75).

Writing to his sister, Mrs. Jane Mecom, five years later, he says:

"It is pity that good works, among some sorts of people, are so little valued, and good words admired in their stead. I mean seemingly pious discourses, instead of humane, benevolent actions. These they almost put out of countenance by calling morality, rotten morality; righteousness, ragged righteousness, and even filthy rags, and when you mention virtue, pucker up their noses; at the same time that they eagerly snuff up an empty, canting harang, as if it were a posy of the choicest flowers" (Works, vol. vii, p. 185).

In the same letter, alluding to faith, hope, and charity, he says:

"Improvement in religion is called building up and edification. Faith is then the ground floor, hope is up one pair of stairs. My dear beloved Jenny, don't delight so much to dwell in those lower rooms, but get as fast as you can into the garret; for in truth the best room in the house is charity. For my part I wish the house was turned upside down" (Ibid. p. 184).

Franklin believed in a future state of existence, but his conception of immortality was that of the Deist, and not of the Christian. In his letter to Whitefield, previously alluded to, he says:

"By heaven, we understand a state of happiness, infinit in degree and eternal in duration. I can do nothing to deserve such a reward. He that, for giving a draught of water to a thirsty person, should expect to be paid with a good plantation, would be modest in his demands compared with those who think they deserve heaven for the little good they do on earth; . . . for my part, I have not the vanity to think I deserve it, the folly to expect, or the ambition to desire it" (Works, vol. vii, p. 75).

In a letter to Mrs. Elizabeth Partridge, he observes:

"With regard to future bliss, I cannot help imagining that multitudes of the zealously orthodox of different sects, who at the last day may flock together in hopes of seeing each other damned, will be disappointed, and obliged to rest content with their own salvation" (Works, vol. x, p. 366).

Writing to his sister, Mrs. Mecom, he says:

"When religious people quarrel about religion, or hungry people about their victuals, it looks as if they had not much of either about them" (Works, vol. vii, p. 438).

In a letter to "A Friend in England" (supposed to be Dr. Priestley), Franklin makes some observations regarding the inspiration of the Bible:

"I agreed with you in sentiments concerning the Old Testament, and thought the clause in our Constitution, which required the members of the Assembly to declare their belief, that the whole of it was given by divine inspiration, had better have been omitted. That I had opposed the clause; but, being overpowered by numbers, and fearing more in future might be grafted on it, I prevailed to have the additional clause, 'that no further or more extended profession of faith should ever be exacted.' I observed to you, too, that the evil of it was the less, as no inhabitant, nor any officer of government, except the members of Assembly, was obliged to make the declaration.

"So much for that letter; to which I may now add, that there are several things in the Old Testament impossible to be given by divine inspiration; such as the approbation ascribed to the angel of the Lord of that abominably wicked and detestable action of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite. If the rest of the book were like that, I should rather suppose it given by inspiration from another quarter, and renounce the whole" (Works, vol. x, p. 134).

He extolled the character of Jesus, but in regard to his divinity he declared himself a skeptic.

His opinion of the Fall of Man, the Atonement, and other Christian doctrines, may be inferred from an anecdote related by him in an essay which he wrote on the "Savages of North America:"

"A Swedish minister having assembled the chiefs of the Sasquehannah Indians, made a sermon to them, acquainting them with the principal historical facts on which our religion is founded, such as the fall of our first parents by eating an apple; the coming of Christ to repair the mischief; his miracles and sufferings, etc. When he had finished, an Indian orator stood up to thank him. 'What you have told us,' said he, 'is all very good. It is indeed bad to eat apples. It is better to make them all into cider. We are much obliged by your kindness in coming so far to tell us those things which you have heard from your mothers. In return, I will tell you some of those which we have heard from ours. In the beginning, our fathers had only the flesh of animals to subsist on; and if their hunting was unsuccessful, they were starving. Two of our young hunters having killed a deer, made a fire in the woods to broil some parts of it. When they were about to satisfy their hunger, they beheld a beautiful young woman descend from the clouds, and seat herself on that hill which you see yonder among the blue mountains. They said to each other, it is a spirit that perhaps has smelt our broiled venison and wishes to eat of it; let us offer some to her. They presented her with the tongue; she was pleased with the taste of it, and said, 'Your kindness shall be rewarded. Come to this place after thirteen moons, and you shall find something that will be of great benefit in nourishing you and your children to the latest generations.' They did so and, to their surprise, found plants they had never seen before; but which, from that ancient time, have been constantly cultivated among us to our great advantage. Where her right hand touched the ground they found maize; where her left hand touched it they found kidney-beans.' . . . The good missionary, disgusted with this idle tale, said, 'What I delivered to you were sacred truths; but what you tell me is mere fable, fiction, and falsehood.' The Indian, offended, replied, 'My brother, it seems your friends have not done you justice in your education; they have not well instructed you in the rules of common civility. You saw that we, who understand and practice these rules, believed all your stories, why do you refuse to believe ours?'"

The following extract from a letter to Jared Ingersoll, written in 1762, shows how he regarded the Christian Sabbath: "When I traveled in Flanders I thought of your excessively strict observation of Sunday, and that a man could hardly travel on that day among you upon his lawful occasions without hazard of punishment, while where I was everyone traveled, if he pleased, or diverted himself in any other way; and in the afternoon both high and low went to the play or the opera, where there was plenty of singing, fiddling, and dancing. I looked around for God's judgments, but saw no sign of them. The cities were well built and full of inhabitants, the markets filled with plenty, the people well favored and well clothed, the fields well tilled, the cattle fat and strong, the fences, houses, and windows all in repair, and no 'old tenor' anywhere in the country; which would make one almost suspect that the deity was not so angry at that offense as a New England justice."

In a letter to Dr. Price he had this to say of religious tests:

"I think they were invented not so much to secure religion as the emoluments of it. When a religion is good, I conceive that it will support itself; and when it does not support itself, and God does not take care to support it, so that its professors are obliged to call for help of the civil power, 'tis a sign, I apprehend, of its being a bad one" (Works, vol. viii, p. 506).

The above was written in 1780. It is as true to-day as it was a century ago, and I respectfully commend it to the prayerful consideration of those pious fanatics who, under the mask of temperance and other reforms, are endeavoring to have religious tests incorporated into our national Constitution.

Clerical conceit and arrogance receive the following merited rebuke from his pen:

"Nowadays we have scarcely a little parson that does not think it the duty of every man within his reach to sit under his petty ministration, and that whoever omits this offends God. To such I wish more humility" (Works, vol. vii, pp. 76, 77).

In an essay on "Toleration" the intolerant character of Christianity is thus presented:

"If we look back into history for the character of the present sects in Christianity, we shall find few that have not in their turns been persecutors, and complainers of persecution. The primitive Christians thought persecution extremely wrong in the pagans, but practiced it on one another. The first Protestants of the Church of England blamed persecution in the Romish church, but practiced it upon the Puritans. These found it wrong in the bishops, but fell into the same practice themselves, both here [England] and in New England" (Works, vol. ii, p. 112).

In a speech which Sparks ascribes to Franklin, we find the following hit at religious dogmatism:

"Most sects in religion think themselves in possession of all truth, and that whenever others differ from them, it is so far error. Steele, a Protestant, in a dedication, tells the pope, that 'the only difference in our two churches, in their opinions of the certainty of their doctrines, is, the Romish church is infallible, and the church of England never in the wrong.'"

On one occasion, when Whitefield visited this country, he wrote to Franklin, stating that the friend with whom he expected to lodge in Philadelphia had left the city. Franklin very naturally tendered him the hospitalities of his home. Referring to Whitefield's acceptance, he writes:

"He replied that, if I made that offer for Christ's sake, I should not miss of a reward. And I returned, 'Don't let me be mistaken; it was not for Christ's sake, but for your sake.' One of our common acquaintances jocosely remarked that, knowing it to be the custom of the saints, when they received any favor, to shift the burden of the obligation from off their own shoulders and place it in heaven, I had contrived to fix it on earth."

The following is an extract from a letter written to Richard Price of England:

"My nephew, Mr. Williams, will have the honor of delivering you this line. It is to request from you a list of a few good books, to the value of about twenty-five pounds, such as are most proper to inculcate principles of sound religion and just government. A new town in the state of Massachusetts having done me the honor of naming itself after me, and proposing to build a steeple to their meeting-house if I would give them a bell, I have advised the sparing themselves the expense of a steeple, for the present, and that they would accept of books instead of a bell, sense being preferred to sound" (Works, vol. x, p. 158).

The fact that Franklin selected a man who denied the infallibility of the Bible and the divinity of Christ, to make a collection of books "to inculcate principles of sound religion," to say nothing of his expressed preference of sense to sound, is of itself sufficient to prove his disbelief in popular Christianity.

At the age of eighty, in a letter to Benjamin Vaughn, of England, he paid the following tribute to the character of heretics:

"Remember me affectionately to good Dr. Price, and to the honest heretic, Dr. Priestley. I do not call him honest by way of distinction, for I think all the heretics I have known have been virtuous men. They have the virtue of fortitude, or they could not venture to own their heresy; and they cannot afford to be deficient in any of the other virtues, as that would give advantage to their many enemies; and they have not, like orthodox sinners, such a number of friends to excuse or justify them. Do not, however, mistake me. It is not to my good friend's heresy that I impute his honesty. On the contrary, 'tis his honesty that brought upon him the character of a heretic" (Works, vol. x, p. 365).

When interrogated as to why he did not promulgate his rational views on religion he replied:

"The things of this world take up too much of my time, of which indeed I have too little left, to undertake anything like a reformation in religion" (Ibid, p. 323).

Franklin was not an Atheist; he did not deny the existence of a God; he believed in a God; but his God was the humane conception of Deism and not the God of Christianity. His biographer, Parton, says:

"He escaped the theology of terror, and became forever incapable of worshiping a jealous, revengeful, and vindictive God" (Life of Franklin, vol. i, p. 71).

"In conversation with familiar friends he called himself a Deist or Theist, and he resented a sentence in Mr. Whitefield's journal which seemed to imply that between a Deist and an Atheist there was little or no difference. Whitefield wrote: 'M. B. is a Deist; I had almost said an Atheist.' 'That is,' said Franklin, 'chalk, I had almost said charcoal'" (Ibid, vol. i, p. 319).

At the age of eighty-four, just previous to his death, in reply to inquiries concerning his religious belief from the president of Yale College, he wrote as follows:

"Here is my creed: I believe in one God, the creator of the universe. That he governs it by his providence. That he ought to be worshiped. That the most acceptable service we render him is doing good to his other children. That the soul of man is immortal, and will be treated with justice in another life respecting its conduct in this."

This is pure Deism. Paine and Voltaire would have readily subscribed to every one of the above six articles of faith. Compare the creed of Franklin with the creed of Paine.

It is not improbable that Franklin had much to do with shaping the Deistic belief of Paine. Parton says:

"Paine was a resident of Philadelphia, a frequenter of Franklin's house, and was as well aware as we are of Dr. Franklin's religious opinions. Nor is there much in the 'Age of Reason' to which Franklin would have refused to assent" (Life of Franklin, vol. ii, p. 553).

For nearly half a century there has been a story afloat to the effect that Franklin attempted to dissuade Paine from publishing his "Age of Reason." This canard, under the caption of "Don't Unchain the Tiger," was published by the American Tract Society, an institution that enjoys the unenviable reputation of having disseminated more unadulterated falsehoods than any other publishing house in America. To properly appreciate this story it is only necessary to recall the fact that Franklin had been dead three years before a page of Paine's work was written. Upon this and his motion for prayers in the Convention that framed our Constitution is based the Christian piety of Franklin. Regarding the latter, it is only necessary to remark that it was in harmony with the second and third articles of his Deistic creed.

Franklin's motion for prayers in the Constitutional Convention has been used as the basis for another clerical falsehood that has been presented to the eyes or ears of nearly every man, woman, and child in the United States. We are told that the Convention for a month opened its sessions without prayer, that at the end of this time nothing had been accomplished, it was in a state of confusion, and on the point of adjourning, when Franklin came forward, proposed that the sessions be opened with prayer, which was adopted, after which the work of the Convention was speedily and successfully performed. This is adduced as a striking proof of the efficacy of prayer. The fact is, there was not a prayer offered in the Convention from the time it convened until it closed. So nearly unanimous were the members in their opposition to Franklin's proposition that not even a vote was taken on it. Franklin himself, referring to it, says: "The Convention, except three or four persons, thought prayers unnecessary."

Reference may be made here to the oft-quoted Epitaph of Franklin. Regarding this the Globe-Democrat of May 7, 1893, says: "This was written by Franklin simply as a jest; it is not and never was on his gravestone."

The "New American Encyclopedia" contains the following relative to Franklin's religion: "Fault has been found with his religious character. He confesses that during a period of his life, before the age of twenty-one, he had been a thorough Deist; and it has been said that five weeks before his death he expressed a 'cold approbation' of the 'system of morals' of 'Jesus of Nazareth.'"

Johnson's "New Universal Encyclopedia" says: "In youth he was an avowed skeptic in religious matters and of somewhat loose morals, but his practical good sense enabled him to correct his way of living, and he in later life treated the Christian religion with reverence, though never avowing his faith in any religious system."

Sparks, though loth to admit that Franklin was not a Christian, says: "It is deeply to be regretted that he did not bestow more attention than he seems to have done on the evidences of Christianity" (Life of Franklin, p. 517).

The truth is, Franklin bestowed more attention on the evidences of Christianity than his Christian biographer is willing to concede. Had he bestowed less attention on these evidences Christianity might not be compelled to lose the prestige of his illustrious name.

Dr. Franklin and Dr. Priestley were intimate friends. Of Franklin, Priestley writes:

"It is much to be lamented that a man of Franklin's general good character and great influence should have been an unbeliever in Christianity, and also have done as much as he did to make others unbelievers" (Priestley's Autobiography, p. 60).

This great man was himself denounced as an Infidel. He was a Unitarian of the most advanced type, and was mobbed and driven from England on account of his heretical opinions and his sympathy with the French Revolution. Franklin's Infidelity must have been of a very radical character to have provoked the censure of Dr. Priestley.

While in France, Franklin consorted chiefly with Freethinkers, among whom were Mirabeau, D'Holbach, D'Alembert, Buffon, and Condorcet. Respecting his religious belief, Parton classes him with Goethe, Schiller, Voltaire, Hume, and Jefferson, and says they would all have belonged to the same church.

Dr. Swing, of Chicago, in a recent sermon, said: "Voltaire, Bolingbroke, Pitt, Burke, Washington, Lafayette, Jefferson, Paine, and Franklin moved along in a wonderful unity of belief, both political and religious, each one wearing some little beauty or deformity of disposition, but all marked by one religious rationalism."

Franklin and Voltaire, a few months before the death of the latter, met for the first time at a theater in Paris. On being introduced, they cordially shook hands. But this was not enough. Each then clasped the other in his arms, and for a moment held him in an affectionate embrace. It was not a mere formal meeting between two aged philosophers; a deeper significance attached to the interesting scene. It was the spontaneous outburst of kindred feelings and a common faith. It was the Deism of the New World, through its most illustrious representative, saluting that of the Old.

Such were the religious opinions of Franklin. The Christian may, with Dr. Priestley, lament that this learned man "should have been an unbeliever in Christianity;" but, notwithstanding his lamentations, the fact remains. He may distort it, but he cannot disprove it. As Dr. Wilson said of Washington, so must it be said of Franklin—"He was a Deist, and nothing more." JOHN E. REMSBURG.

On the Origin of Sabbaths.

We may define a sabbath to be a day sacred to a god, on which it is unlawful for any worshiper of that god to labor. Sabbaths are found everywhere, for it appears to be a general rule throughout the world that gods should have days consecrated to them, and that on those days the followers of those gods may do no work, no matter whether the holy day recurs weekly, monthly, or yearly. The notion appears to be that to refrain from work on a day dedicated to a god is a mode of showing respect. As soon as this view becomes generally accepted, then to work on a holy day is to show want of respect; then as the gods of uncultured peoples are, like uncultured peoples themselves, very sensitive to slights of this nature, the god whose dignity or vanity has been hurt revenges himself by punishing the sabbath-breaker or by punishing his followers at large, because they have not vindicated his honor by punishing the culprits themselves. Then, since to work on the holy day is likely to call down punishment on the individual or on the community, the axiom that it is unlucky to work on that day becomes accepted, and people will not labor or transact business or journey on it.

Bna-da, the second day of the seven-day period of the Tshi tribes, is sacred to the gods of the sea, and is, in consequence, the sabbath of all those who are worshipers of the sea-gods—that is to say, fishermen and those whose vocations take them on the sea. On Bna-da propitiatory offerings are made to the sea-gods, and no one may catch fish. It is the fisherman's day of rest, and, before the colonial government interfered with native customs, any native who violated it by going fishing was put to death, just as was the custom among the Israelites with their own sabbath-breakers (Exodus xxxi, 14, 15; Numbers xv, 32). Similarly, the fifth day, Fi-da, is sacred to the gods who preside over agriculture, and is the holy day or sabbath of all persons who cultivate the soil. Here, then, are two cases of sabbaths recurring every seventh day, just as with the Israelites.

The Babylonian Assyrians had the seven-day week and a weekly sabbath. Mr. George Smith says: "In the year 1869 I discovered among other things a curious religious calendar of the Assyrians, in which every month is divided into four weeks, and the seventh days or 'sabbaths' are marked out as days on which no work should be undertaken" (Assyrian Discoveries, p. 12). Whether the Assyrian month here referred to was lunar or civil we are not told, but the Rev. A. H. Sayce tells us that, according to the lunar division of the year, "the seventh, fourteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth were days of 'rest,' on which certain works were forbidden" (Records of the Past, vol. i, p. 164), so it seems that the Assyrians had subdivided the lunar month in much the same way as the Tshi tribes have.

As a rule, the institution of the sabbath appears to be primarily due to moon-worship, a form of worship which seems to have been almost universal. With all deference to the opinion of that school which fancies it can trace a solar myth in almost every tradition and folklore tale, we think that moon-worship was and is much more general than sun-worship, and for the simple reason that the regular daily recurrence of the sun is far less likely to excite speculation and wonder in uncivilized man than the varying phases and periodical disappearance and reappearance of the moon.

When the sabbath recurs every fourth, fifth, or seventh day, the day on which it falls naturally comes in course of time to be called the fourth, fifth, or seventh day, though really properly the first day of the week. Thus Ako-ojo is always called the fifth day, though the words themselves mean "first day." The same change seems to have taken place among the Israelites. On the twenty-ninth day of the moon they began to watch for the new moon, and the day after its appearance was the first day of the new moon or month. Supposing them to have had a seven-day week and a moon sabbath on the day of the new moon, the sabbath would have fallen on the first day of the week, but as people would naturally count from one sabbath to the next, the day after the sabbath would be termed the first day, the next, the second, and so on, so that the sabbath itself would come to be called the seventh day. This is, no doubt, the explanation of the sixth-seventh day being sacred to the new-moon festival, as stated in the hymn to Amen-Ra, for the day of the new moon must have been the first day of the lunar month, and also the first day of the week, or subdivision of the lunar month.

Though it is quite possible that the Israelites may have invented a seven-day week and a weekly sabbath spontaneously, like the Tshi and Ga tribes, yet the evidence of the books of the Old Testament goes to show that they borrowed both these institutions from the Babylonian Assyrians during the captivity, and that prior to that epoch they had, like the Mendis, Bechuanas, and Sofalese, only a monthly sabbath, which was the festival of the new moon. No mention of a weekly sabbath is to be found in Joshua. Judges, the books of Samuel, or the first book of Kings. After Deuteronomy v, 15, no mention of a weekly sabbath is found till we reach 2 Kings iv, 23, and the word sabbath does not appear either in Psalms or Proverbs. But there is more than a mere omission to mention a weekly sabbath in the old historical books; there is evidence that the institution was unknown, for many occurrences are described by which the weekly sabbath, had it existed, must have been violated. Jericho was encompassed for seven days in succession, which must, therefore, have included one weekly sabbath (Joshua vi, 13-16). During the events narrated in 1 Samuel xxix, xxx, David was on the march for twelve days in succession, without any day of rest being observed; and since Solomon gave a feast to the people of Israel which lasted fourteen days (1 Kings viii, 65, and 2 Chronicles vii, 9), and so must have included two sabbaths, he could have known nothing of the injunction that on the sabbath every man was to abide in his own place (Exodus xvi, 29). Elijah must likewise have broken the rest of several weekly sabbaths (1 Kings xix, 7, 8). In the article on Marriage and Kinship among the Ancient Israelites we gave several valid reasons for supposing that the Levitical law was not compiled till about the period of the Babylonian captivity, and this ignorance of the institution of the weekly sabbath on the part of those who must have known about it, had it existed, is an additional reason.

From all this we infer that before coming in contact with the Babylonian Assyrians the Israelites had no weekly sabbath or day of rest recurring every seventh day, but had a festival of the new moon on the first day of the lunar month (1 Samuel xx, 27), which, as we shall show, was observed by them as a day of rest, as it is by other peoples at the present day. After they had adopted the weekly sabbath from the Babylonians, they endeavored, through national vanity, to show that they had always observed it, and to account for it they inserted in their books two traditions of their origin which are fatally at variance. Exodus xx, 10, 11, says: "For in six days Jahveh made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that therein is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore Jahveh blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it"; while in Deuteronomy v, 15, we read: "And remember thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that Jahveh, thy God, brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and a stretched-out arm; therefore Jahveh, thy God, commanded thee to keep the sabbath day."

In the later books, written after contact with the Babylonians, we find sabbaths frequently mentioned and strongly insisted upon, but nearly always in connection with new moons. Thus, in Nehemiah x, 33, we read, "For the continual burnt offering, of the sabbaths, of the new moons"; in Isaiah i, 13, "The new moons and sabbaths"; in Isaiah lxvi, 23, "And it shall come to pass that from one new moon to another, and from one sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith Jahveh"; in Ezekiel xlv, 17, "In the feasts, and in the new moons and in the sabbaths"; and in Hosea ii, 11, "Her feasts, her new moons, and her sabbaths." New moons and sabbaths are also mentioned together in 1 Maccabees x, 24; 1 Esdras v, 32, and in Judith viii, 6. In Ezekiel xlvi, i, we read that the gate of the inner court of the temple was to "be shut the six working days," and opened on the sabbath and the day of the new moon, which shows that the latter was a day of rest. The offering to be made on the day of the new moon was superior to that made on the sabbath (v, 4, 5). In Amos viii, 5, we read: "When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn, and the sabbath, that we may set forth wheat?" which again shows that the day of the new moon was a day of rest. (New moons are mentioned alone—that is, without sabbaths—in Ezra iii, 5. Ezra does not anywhere mention the sabbath.)

In no one of these passages is the new-moon festival spoken of as inferior in importance to the sabbath. On the contrary, since the offering was superior, it is to be presumed that the festival was also superior. Each was a day of rest.—Col. A. B. Ellis, in the Popular Science Monthly.

News and Notes.

They say it never rains in Arizona, but it does rain, and it rains awfully at times. All the last week it has been pouring down, and the country is flooded; railroads are torn up and there is but little chance of travel at present. One can neither get out nor get in to Prescott. They say this is the ragged edge of the great California storm which has been raging for a month or so, and which is sweeping eastward to the Atlantic, and its battalions will race along the prairies of Kansas, Illinois, etc., and strike the Atlantic with a roar. So I guess the whole country will get the benefit of this enormous baptism. It very seldom rains in the month of January in Arizona. But this seems to be an exceptional year and beats the record. The month of December was delightful. Even the blizzards of North Dakota hid away as if afraid of the splendors of the sun; but now the elements are let loose, and are making up for lost time. However, I think the worst is over for this part of the country. The shining blue sky is overhead while I write this; and everything looks fresh and beautiful, as if nature had been thoroughly washed; and a white drapery mantles the earth, and the mountains round about glitter in silver radiance. The world looks like a gorgeous palace. Dame Nature is putting on her holiday attire after this tremendous cleaning up. She looks as spick and span as a bride, gleaming with jewels far as the eye can reach.

Through rain and shine, however, we have proceeded with the campaign here. The Prescott Freethought Federation has completed its organization, and on Friday night last elected its officers: Dr. J. Miller, president; P. A. Williams, D. W. Pritchett, Sharlot M. Hall, Thomas Roach, J. Rodenburg, vice-presidents; J. W. Roberts, secretary; and Mrs. Belle Shull, treasurer. The membership is now nearly one hundred. The main object is to establish headquarters with a free library and reading-room, and to hold meetings during the winter with lectures, essays, etc., by home talent, and form the nucleus for a state organization to push the demands of Liberalism. The outlook is promising. There is good material here for Freethought advance and education. The community has been aroused as never before. I intended to make a tour throughout the country this week, but the storm will prevent my carrying out the plans arranged, though I still hope to do something in this direction. I must wait for the streams to return to their natural boundaries. At present it is dangerous to cross these swift and thundering torrents. Still, it does not take long in this country for nature to recover her wonted equanimity. In a few days the ravages of the great tempest will disappear; and it will make more splendid the harvests of the coming season.

We are arranging for a big Paine celebration Jan. 29th, which will close the campaign here with a great blaze of enthusiasm, I am sure. Dr. J. Miller, Professor Bell, Miss Sharlot M. Hall, and myself will make the speeches, and others will furnish the music and recitations. Professor Bell has drifted to this far-away country, and takes its changing fortunes with his usual philosophic placidity. He knows what it is to be in the pioneer camp.

In my lecture on "The Religious Conspiracy" at Waco, Texas, and other places, I quoted the following from an encyclical letter of the pope:

"I anathematize all who maintain the liberty of the press, and advocates of the liberty of speech, which is the liberty of perdition. The absurd and erroneous doctrines, or ravings, in defense of liberty of conscience are a most pestilential error—a pest of all others most to be dreaded in the state. I anathematize those who assert the liberty of conscience and of religious worship, and all such as maintain that the church may not employ force.

"Public schools open to all children for the education of the young should be under the control of the Roman church, and should not be subject to the civil powers nor made to conform to the opinions of the age. The Roman church has a right to interfere in the discipline of public schools, and in the arrangement of the studies of public schools and in the choice of the teachers of these schools."

The truthfulness of this extract has been questioned by some members of the church of Rome, for many Roman Catholics are not in favor of such a declaration, and do not want it put on record. Mr. J. D. Shaw, and others, desired my authority. Although I was quite sure that I was correct in the extract, having quoted it from authentic documents before me, I was unable to give the date of the encyclical letters containing the extract, and it is pretty difficult to get hold of these letters, for the Catholics carefully conceal documents when they contain such declarations worthy of the dark ages. I have now found my authority, and I desire to put it on record for future reference, as I consider the extract to express the real spirit of the church of Rome to-day, and it is an important record.

My authority is a book entitled "Our Country," by the Rev. Josiah Strong, with an introduction by Prof. Austin Phelps, of Andover Theological Seminary. It is published by the American Home Missionary Society, Bible House, Astor Place, New York; pages 46 to 59, in chapter on "Romanism."

This extract is to be found mainly in an encyclical letter of Pope Pius IX, Aug. 15, 1854, and also of date Dec. 8, 1864. I refer inquirers to this book.

It may be well to give some other quotations found in this book to show the spirit of the church of Rome.

Says Bishop O'Connor: "Religious liberty is merely endured until the opposit can be carried into effect without peril to the Catholic world."

The Catholic Review says: "Protestantism of every form, has not, and never can have, any right where Catholicity is triumphant."

The archbishop of St. Louis once said: "Heresy and unbelief are crimes; and in Christian countries, as in Italy and Spain, for instance, where all the people are Catholics, and where the Catholic religion is an essential part of the law of the land, they are punished as other crimes."

The Boston Pilot says: "No good government can exist without religion, and there can be no religion without an Inquisition, which is wisely designed for the promotion and protection of the new faith."

Every cardinal, archbishop, and bishop in the Catholic church takes an oath of allegiance to the pope in which occur the following words: "Heresies, schismatics, and rebels to our said Lord (the pope), or his aforesaid successor, I will, to my utmost, persecute and oppose" (R. W. Thompson's "The Papacy and the Civil Power," p. 717).

Says the Cincinnati Catholic Telegraph: "It will be a glorious day for the Catholics in this country when, under the blows of justice and morality, our school system will be shattered to pieces."

Bishop Gilmour, in his Lenten Letter, March, 1873, said: "Nationalities must be subordinate to religion, and we must learn that we are Catholics first and citizens next."

Cardinal McCloskey says: "They (the Catholics of the United States) are as strongly devoted to the sustenance and maintenance of the temporal power of the pope as Catholics in any part of the world; and if it should be necessary to prove it by acts, they are ready to do so."

Cardinal Manning puts the following sentences in the mouth of the pope: "I acknowledge no civil power; I am the subject of no prince; and I claim more than this, I claim to be the supreme judge and director of the consciences of men; of the peasant that tills the fields, and of the prince that sits upon the throne; of the household that lives in the shade of privacy, and the legislator that makes laws for the kingdoms; I am the sole last supreme judge of what is right and wrong."

Again he says: "Moreover, we declare, affirm, define, and pronounce it to be necessary to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman Pontiff."

Cardinal Bellarmine declares: "If the Pope should err by enjoining vices or forbidding virtues, the church would be obliged to believe vices to be good, and virtues bad."

It is well to know what Rome is from the affirmations of Rome itself. Comment is unnecessary.

From Prescott I shall go to Tucson, Arizona, where I shall give five lectures, Feb. 2, 3, 4, 5. I shall also lecture at Santa Fé, New Mexico, and Trinidad, Colorado, from Feb. 13 to March 1. I expect to be at Moline, Michigan; Rising Sun, Indiana; Cincinnati, Boston, etc., on my tour East, March and April. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Paine Anniversary.

The Brooklyn Philosophical Association held its Paine anniversary meeting last Sunday afternoon in the big and commodious hall of the Long Island Business College. A large and representative audience was present, the ladies being a conspicuous portion of it. Mr. Henry Rowley presided and made the opening address, dwelling on the clearness of construction of Paine's writings and their fullness of thought, and saying everyone should study them for this reason, irrespective of their religious or political beliefs, closing with some of Thomas Paine's gems of thought. Mr. T. B. Wakeman was the orator of the occasion, his subject being "What We Owe to Thomas Paine." To him, the speaker said, we owe the initiative idea and movement of this republic as well as the means for perpetuating it. No one in the crisis of the Revolution had any idea of founding a government such as was founded; no one suggested independence from the mother country until Paine did in a short article in the Pennsylvania Magazine. They wanted only to fight the oppression and hoped for a reconciliation when the war was over. Therefore, to Thomas Paine, "the first-hand soul," the original thinker, the independent and earnest man, the friend of humanity, the striver for the rights of man, we owe this republic, where all are free and equal; from earliest times down there was no conception of such a republic. Mr. Wakeman also briefly told of the trials of Paine, in his struggle for right and liberty, showing that to his stormy life we are indebted for many blessings. Not only did Paine first suggest American Independence; he also advocated the emancipation of slaves, the political freedom of woman, as well as many other reforms. Mr. Wakeman censured this country for its treatment of Paine, and hoped that some day, not very far away, law and social custom would dedicate the 29th of January to Paine's memory as the 22d of February is consecrated to Washington, and the 4th of July is set aside to commemorate the adoption of the Declaration of Independence. It was an admirable address, to which a synopsis can hardly do justice. Splendid singing and instrumental music made out the excellent program. The rich, full baritone voice of Mr. J. R. Macdonald was heard at its best, in a solo, entitled "My Sweetheart, Au Revoir," the accompanist being Mr. Van Voorhees; also in a duet with a friend, whose name we did not get. Five members of the Amaranth Club with violins and zithers rendered some popular tunes very sweetly. They were liked, and it was a question whether the players would get tired first or the audience in bestowing applause and encores. The afternoon was a very enjoyable one. The addresses were excellent, and the music satisfying. In connection with this celebration, it is not out of the way to say in all probability a Paine celebration will take place in the coming summer under the auspices of the Manhattan Liberal Club or the Liberals of New York and Brooklyn.

One eminent clerical reviewer, in spite of Darwin's thirty years of quiet labor, and in spite of the powerful summing up of his book, prefaced a diatribe by saying that Darwin "might have been more modest had he given some slight reason for dissenting from the views generally entertained." Another distinguished clergyman, vice-president of a Protestant institute to combat "dangerous science," declared Darwinism "an attempt to dethrone God." Another critic spoke of persons accepting the Darwinian views as "under the frenzied inspiration of the inhaler of mephitic gas," and of Darwin's argument as a "jungle of fanciful assumptions." Another spoke of Darwin's views as suggesting that "God is dead," and declared that Darwin's work "does open violence to everything which the Creator himself has told us in the scriptures of the methods and results of his work." Still another theological authority declares: "If the Darwinian theory is true, Genesis is a lie, the whole framework of the book of life falls to pieces, and the revelation of God to man, as we Christians know it, is a delusion and a snare." Another, who has shown excellent qualities as an observing naturalist, declared, the Darwinian view "a huge imposture from the beginning."—Andrew D. White, in the Popular Science Monthly.

Letters of Friends.

How Many Veterans There Are!

OGDEN, UTAH, Jan. 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received and read some in "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and can indorse all the good things said about it. I have just passed my eighty-third year, and am still active and happy. I wish everybody could say so in these distressed times of bad government by villainous robber rulers.

As ever yours, JOHN A. JOST.

Religionist Not in a Normal Condition.

BUSHNELL, ILL., Jan. 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3.25 for subscription, which I find, on "looking carefully on the wrapper," is nearly dead, and for the Ingersoll lecture on the "Holy Bible."

I have discovered that a man possessed of religion is not in his normal state, and can be restored only by careful, patient, and persistent treatment. Heston can't be beat.

S. L. BABBITT, M.D.

Will Answer a Christian Question.

EASTON, WASH., Jan. 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have received and read "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." It is a splendid work, and Mr. Putnam deserves the praise of every Freethinker in the country. This grand work should be in every Liberal's home. "What has Freethought done for civilization and the betterment of mankind?" is a question often asked by our Christian friends, and we can hand the book to them, and say, "Read and investigate for yourself."

PETER H. WIIS.

A Paper for Our Children.

Jan. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to add a word of indorsement of Ida Ballou's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 5. We need such a paper for our young people the very worst way, and I am willing to become a subscriber to a reasonable number of copies, say half a dozen; what I don't want for myself I can give away. I should like to see such a paper undertaken by Miss Wixon, Mrs. Slenker, or any other able Liberal, of whom there are many.

Yours for the rising generation,

J. S. PALMER.

Enthusiastic for Steiner.

CLARK, PA., Jan. 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $1.50 to apply on my subscription. You don't need to be afraid of me, for I am not a believer in Christianity, but hold it better that the millions of dollars annually raised to send Christianity among the heathen should remain here at home, in the United States. Civilize our own country first. See THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 12, 1895, page 22, and that will explain the facts of Christian morality. Up with the flag of Freethought and wave it over the head of Franklin Steiner.

G. W. URMSON.

The Fight is on Now.

DOLGEVILLE, N. Y., Jan. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $7 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and one copy of the ANNUAL. The remainder use as you like.

I hope to have a lecture in Dolgeville some day. We have a good Turner Hall here.

The pope made a great assertion when he said he wants the rulers to lend their support to religious creeds. That means to crush out all Freethought. The time is coming when the church and state question will have to be settled.

R. McDUGAL.

Tolerance and Consistency.

CINCINNATI, O., Jan. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I read your good paper weekly. I never knew its value until I had been a Spiritualist for a number of years; but I see you give us a rap occasionally. Perhaps it is deserved. Every ism has its oddities—people who don't understand their own doctrines, and who would help their cause along best by keeping quiet. But the church has its unchristian members, and Liberalism some very illiberal advocates—illiberal in denouncing that of which they are ignorant. To these I would respectfully say: "Look before you leap." No one is so blind as the wilfully blind. There is good in everything, but good in the searcher is a prerequisite to finding it."

ARTHUR F. MILTON.

It Has a Musical Ring.

MILFORD, MASS., Jan. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $10, for which please send books and papers as per list, and use the remainder to circulate the Chicago congress pamphlet. Renew my TRUTH SEEKER. The other copy goes as a New Year's gift to a friend. This will be the first Freethought paper to enter his town, so far as I know. He told me he would read and show the paper, and then circulate it where it would do the most good. He felt quite sure that he could get one or two new subscribers, and possibly three, before next January comes. When there arrives an icy time and horses' shoes need sharpening, he opens his shop on Sunday (it is located very near three churches) and then the church people can hear him pound the anvil at the same time the ministers are pounding their pulpits; and his music is much the more agreeable as well as useful.

Yours truly, C. C. FISK.

California to New York.

CENTREVILLE, CAL., Jan. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As I think it a duty of every Liberal-minded man and Freethinker to donate what his circumstances will permit, if he wishes to enjoy liberty of conscience during life, to curtail the power of ecclesiastical oppressors who would dictate to their fellow men and women how to use Sunday or any other time. I therefore send you out of my rather limited income one dollar to fight priestcraft at Albany on the Sunday question. The donation is small, but if all who feel an interest in this would do as much you would be more than able to raise the $500 that you say is needed to make a fight for the cause of free action and free thought. I am a reader of your valuable paper, and the reading of it has aroused a desire in me to do what little I can to maintain our liberty on Sunday as well as all other days. We must be free from priestly interference.

JOHN J. RISER.

This Editor Has Not "Roasted Governor Waite."

SALIDA, COLO., Jan. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Will ye editor who has roasted Governor Waite and the Populist party over the Secular fire, consider the inclosed [Governor Waite's letter in reply to petition for re-opening of gambling-houses in Denver], and give the ex-Colorado governor a rebate on this line? And as you set ajar the door of your charity, think of us poor Western devils, whose silver industry has been wiped out, hopes blasted, a laudable enterprise prostrated, tens of thousands of honest laborers turned out of employment, one-half of our specie declared to be dishonest money, and nothing in return but an increasing bonded indebtedness demanding gold interest. This all accomplished by the Democratic and Republican parties through class legislation, and in the interest of the banking gold sharks, continually decreasing our circulating medium.

If the Populists as a party come nearer, my God, to thee, in the Constitution, than either of the two old parties, I fail to comprehend the trend of these two political fossils; hence this apology. Come along with the Secular pioneer; look at the vacated mines, left to be the haunts of bats and owls; see the doleful state of affairs, once prosperous, and people happy; know there is no remedy for the country, for the crying multitude, under the influence of the two old parties in power. Investigate, realize the serious condition of our country. If you have a doubt, give the weak, the poor, the benefit of that doubt.

H. MURRAY.

A Landable Ambition.

SOUTH AMBOY, N. J., Jan. 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $8.25, for which please extend my subscription to January 1, 1896, and forward to me "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," the ANNUAL, and "Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns," etc.

There are quite a number of books I would like to own, and leave to my children when I give up the ghost, but think I will have to wait a little while longer before I am able to buy them. Although I own a small collection of Liberal books I am anxious to possess a good Liberal library. If I live to see my children grow up, I shall see that they do not become the victims of religious lunacy.

My wife is a Lutheran by tradition, but neither prays nor goes to church. She takes no stock in religious tomfoolery.

So you see my children will not easily become religious lunatics.

Sincerely yours, AUGUST BEHN.

Common Sense from the Pulpit.

GRANGER, MINN., Jan. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Will you allow a little space to one who has been a subscriber for seventeen years to your grand old paper and never troubled you before?

We have some very good people in our little valley on the Upper Iowa who are coming to do a great deal of thinking for themselves. Recently we were called to lay to rest one of our most respected citizens, Geo. Damond, who was a pronounced Liberal; the remains were taken to the M. E. church, and the pastor, Rev. Harkness, gave a discourse that was most acceptable to us who deeply feel the loss of this good man.

We are glad to note that our church has become so that we can sit and hear a little common sense coming from the pulpit on such occasions.

My TRUTH SEEKER is ever cheerfully loaned to those of my neighbors who care to read it.

HENRY ARNOLD.

Warm Praise for the Pilgrim.

PULLMAN, WASH., Jan. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3.35 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the ANNUAL. I am sorry that I could not remit sooner, but when I tell you that farmers of Palouse country are striving to live by raising wheat at Democratic prices, from seventeen to twenty-five cents per bushel, you will admit that I have a reasonable excuse for being delinquent. I was hoping to send you a new subscriber this time, but money is too hard to get. I find many Liberals here who would like to take your paper, and would if times were as good as two years ago; and there are many who would order Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," but cannot afford it at the present time. I will send you an order for it as soon as I can. Friend Putnam was here some two years ago and gave us two lectures. He accomplished great good here in this chrysoth-ridden town. I would like to see him again; he is doing a noble work. I wish you success in spreading the light of reason and justice. Long live THE TRUTH SEEKER.

M. W. DRINKWATER.

Of Course She Pleased the Ohioans.

CINCINNATI, O., Jan. 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. M. P. Krekel, of Kansas City, Mo., lectured for this society last Sunday evening upon the subject, "Christian Civilization or Civil Christianity, Which?" All those whom we have heard express their opinion, had the highest admiration and praise for her lecture.

We were very much surprised by the remarkable erudition and intelligence manifested throughout this most interesting address, in which difficult definitions were formulated with ease and ability, and indelicate parts incident to the subject were rendered euphemistically, which is a quality quite commendable and sometimes lacking in a Freethought lecturer. In fact, we were so captivated by her that, before she left, we were fortunate in engaging her for the five Sundays in March. Such a lecturer and person as Mrs. Krekel is a credit to the Freethought platform.

As she will be in this city for the month of March, and having to lecture only Sunday evenings, it would be well for the Freethinkers in the cities and towns of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and West Virginia, to engage her services for week-day evenings.

Any communication addressed her, care of the writer, will reach her promptly.

The Best of Legacies.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For inclosed $3.75 please credit me with one year's subscription and send me "Is Suicide a Sin?" "Lincoln," and "Shakspeare."

I cannot forbear telling you how delighted my mother was with the German edition of Colonel Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses," which I sent her through the Truth Seeker Company for a Christmas present. She is in her seventy-ninth year and is still vigorous in mind and body. I have not the pleasure of being with her except on my yearly vacation, as she lives in Wisconsin, but she writes me that nothing could have pleased her better than this book, and certainly nothing could have pleased me better than to hear this. My parents were originally Catholics, but after immigrating to this country they renounced Catholicism and embraced the rational religion of humanity and Agnosticism, in which belief my father died, and in which my mother still happily lives. It is this rich legacy of Freethought they have left their children, for which I have ever thanked and blessed them. Like Byron I have often said:

"It may be that in this I am alone,
But I would not exchange my Freethought for a throne—

Only I know I am not alone.

Yours truly, J. J. SHIRLEY.

The Effect of Early Training.

CHAPIN HOME, Dec. 12, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Not long since I had occasion to call on a few friends; among them was an elderly religious lady who had permanent boarders. She, being full of superstition and bigotry, was constantly with her Bible, when not engaged with household affairs. The family assembled every Sunday evening in the drawing-room, where matters of serious character were discussed—creeds, sects, and religious matters in general.

A Freethinker boldly ventured to declare his preference for R. G. Ingersoll and his sentiments, and opposed the Christian religion as being founded on miracles, those being based on denial of the laws of nature. A deep sensation was created in the company, and a stifled expression of horror, with a slight moving of chairs. A short silence ensued, and then one of the party asked the skeptic a question: "You don't believe in miracles, and why?" "For the reason already mentioned. They contradict the laws of nature, and are opposed to all experience."

The conversation became general. The lady said she never heard one talk better. "To what church do you belong?" "I belong to the free church of reason and common sense." "I never heard of that church." "It is the church to which Ingersoll belongs." "Ah me, the Infidel," exclaimed the pious matron, with uplifted hands and eyes, and left the room saying to a friend, "I would not have believed it of so intelligent a man."

S. R. THORNE.

Still it Was a Wrong Use of the Word "Religion."

WATSONTOWN, PA., Jan. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Your criticism on page 21 of THE TRUTH SEEKER concerning what "The Unlicensed Preacher" wrote in Field and Farm, of Denver, will be amusing to the author, Mr. Jacob Huff, of Grand Junction, Col., if he sees it. He is one of the most clever Infidels I have ever had the pleasure of meeting, as is also the editor of Field and Farm. I doubt whether there is another agricultural paper in the world that would allow such sermons to run in its columns. I believe it would be a good thing for THE TRUTH SEEKER to reprint these sermons, as they are tough on hypocrisy. Mr. Huff, author of these sermons, has written for THE TRUTH SEEKER on several occasions and years ago he was a regular contributor to the Investigator. He has also written for Henry George.

In the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER Geo. E. Macdonald asks for the opinion of some of his agricultural friends concerning an attack of the editor of the People. I was partly raised on a farm and have edited agricultural journals and believe I know whereof I speak. In the Eastern states you will not find one farm out of every thousand containing as much as 260 acres. I know plenty of farmers in Pennsylvania who have raised large families on less than one hundred acres and as low as twenty-five acres, and they have money to loan every year. When the banks of the small Pennsylvania towns want to borrow money, where do they go? To the large cities? No. They go out among the farmers to raise it, and they generally get all they want. I wish some one would tell me where the farm is located in Central or Western Pennsylvania which contains 260 acres of clear land. Probably at some poorhouse or asylum, but there are very few belonging to individuals. One man and a family of eight cannot handle a 260 acre farm here in the East, nor can they in the West. Two hundred and sixty acres of medium good land will support thirty people. Of course there are families that a million acres of good land would not support. Perhaps there may be some preachers that know more than I do about farming, but I have helped farm in Pennsylvania, Kansas, and Colorado.

J. WARD DIEHL.

Another Splendid Freethinker Gone.

CLINTON, IA., Jan. 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: To-day, by request of the relatives of the late B. F. Gove, I send to you a short obituary of the deceased. I send it to the Investigator also, for, like myself, he was a subscriber to both that paper and your own.

Benjamin F. Gove was born in Deering, N. H., March 14, 1826, and died at Hahnemann Hospital, Chicago, Ill., on Tuesday morning, Jan. 1, 1895; and on the afternoon of the same day his body was cremated in Chicago, in accordance with his own request. His death was caused by blood poisoning, the result of an operation to remove a tumor from his throat. While in health and in possession of his faculties he often said that as he desired to kill no one while he lived, so after the animating spark had fled he would not like to have his remains, by being buried in the ground, contaminate air or water by decomposition to the injury of those who should survive him. He therefore considered cremation the better way to dispose of the dead. He often said, also, that when he had passed away he wanted no preacher to deliver a sermon over his remains. He regarded life as the proper time to show good will; and those he left behind, though not exactly coinciding in his religious opinions, respected his wishes, and his ashes were placed in the grave at De Witt, Iowa, without any theological display.

Mr. Gove had enjoyed good health until about four months before his death, when he began to be troubled with his throat. At first he thought it was asthma, but after a little, and by the advice of a local physician who told him that there was something growing in his windpipe, he went to Chicago, with the above result. The growth proved to be a cancerous tumor. Mr. Gove was very radical in his views on matters of a so-called religious nature, but very mild and undogmatic, and very considerate of the feelings of those with whom he came in contact holding opposite opinions. He was in all respects a grand and good man. Would to heaven there were more of his kind in the world to-day. He was a loving husband, a kind and indulgent father, always mindful of the welfare and happiness of his family and acquaintances. He held many offices of public trust, in all of which he proved faithful and worthy. He was school teacher, school director, justice of the peace, assessor, trustee, and deputy sheriff. He took a deep interest in the Old Settlers' societies of Clinton county, and was a prominent figure at their annual gatherings. A widow, five sons, two daughters, and hundreds of friends mourn their loss.

JAMES A. GREENHILL.

The Holy Corporation.

How like a modern corporation
Is Rome's religious aggregation!
There's God, who is the president,
And rules the board, to all intent;
But if the matter's deeply probed,
You'll find the real power robed
In garments rich and jewels rare,
The same the present pope doth wear.

The pope is the vice-president,
And on all questions pertinent
That touch the Christian faith or morals,
Or the ecclesiastic quarrels,

He, as the president's away,
Determines things as best he may.

Cardinals are the directors' board
That sanctions the work of their president
Lord;

And only elect a pope, you know,
For God presides ex-officio.

The priests are agents of the church,
Who gull the savage, and use the birch
To bind our youth to Peter's rock
And make them buy the church's stock.
Certificates are thus wise given:
"So many shares of stock in heaven."
But what's their value is unguessable,
Although all stock is quite assessable.

Like other boom-towns, maps are given
To show you what a place is heaven.
Streets are warranted "paved with gold";
The choicest town-lots are unsold,
The finest "mansions are prepared."
All furnished well and nicely aired;
And for those of the corporation,
They're ready all for occupation.
And as a further inducement, they
Have built a gentle, easy way,
That leads straight to this fine possession,
The only toll is one confession.
And furthermore to make complete
The alluring prospect, still more sweet,
They offer, what you must desire,
The very finest band and choir
Of singers, whose seraphic voices
Make buyers happy at their choices;
And lest you fail by the way divine,
They give you "angels' food" and "wine";
A tempting diet, too, withal,
If it were not so cannibal,
For, hide the "truth" howe'er they can,
They know it is both "God" and "man."

All these are promised to the buyer,
There's nothing left mind can desire;
But not till death do they intend
To ever declare a dividend;
And though the unknown may conceal
The pleasure the stockholders feel,
Yet can the church with "honest" pride
Declare that each one's satisfied.

Alack! 'tis sad that 'tis a jest;
That we can't really invest
Our money in this corporation,
And be assured of exaltation
In that bright after-world to come,
As set forth by the church of Rome.
Alas! that such talk's so much vapor,
And heaven is but on papal paper,
And ex-Stockholder,
VINCENT C. COSTELLO.

They Did Not Print It.

MEADVILLE, MISS., Jan. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see so many good letters and such able articles in the grand old TRUTH SEEKER that I can see no place for anything from myself; yet I feel it is due you that I acknowledge the pleasure I feel in reading it. I cannot say it is the best paper on earth, not having seen them all, but I do say it is the best I have seen. The editorials are to me simply grand! I wish it was a daily instead of a weekly. Heston's cartoons must provoke occasionally a smile even from "that ill-humored Old Joss," to say nothing of hilarity from saints and angels who have taken refuge upstairs. I am sure if he carries the art much nearer to perfection, he will burst the devil's business, and hell will be for rent in the near future, to be run on extra occasions by Jones Bros., Talmage & Co., and others of that gentry. Then Freethinkers may look for the joining of the two countries—not, however, to be called "greater" heaven or "greater" hell, but blended "heav-ell."

I do not see any improvement to be made on THE TRUTH SEEKER; it is all good enough. While I have no children to read the Children's Corner, I read it myself with the avidity of a hungry wolf! A happy and prosperous New Year to Miss Susan Wixon; in fact, to all of THE TRUTH SEEKER family and friends. For myself I wish no greater heaven throughout all eternity than to bask in the effulgence of the high order of intellectual light that shines on me weekly through the columns of the loved TRUTH SEEKER.

These people are all church people. The Methodist minister who preached on this circuit last year became offended with some one, or some of his work, and wrote a scathing article which was published in the Christian Advocate. He termed this circuit a cesspool, wherein the filth of surrounding communities had been dumped. His assault made the people angry. His broad and sweeping blow fell heavily upon two other denominations. My mother being a Baptist, I felt it was right for me to pick up the gauntlet and, if possible, to make a point for freedom as well as resent a thrust at the creed of my sacred mother. For fear some would not know my position who read what I had to say, I defined it thus: "I have no fight to make for or against these churches for myself; I freely concede to each human the right to mental freedom and independence, both in religion and politics; I am a stickler for no party whose cardinal principles would rob the citizen of rights inherent through nature; I bend to no creed whose dogmas are dripping with the dye of superstition; I bow to no precedent by hereditament or early environments in life that would suppress the fullness of thought; I neither worship nor acknowledge an infinit God as ruling throughout the cycles of time, and who has been unable, or unwilling, to remove from his domain conditions that have rendered ninety-nine per cent of his subjects unhappy and miserable the most of their short lives through evils which the most of us have been taught from infancy to believe are the works of the creative genius of one who is possessed of the sublime attributes of infinit wisdom, power, and goodness. In the dusts of time I can see the footprint of no such God. My fight is not for him; if he is not a myth, the condition of his business on earth bespeaks him a weakling unworthy of assistance from human source. My fight is for the rights of man; to better his condition my aim; the truth I would sustain; a falsehood I would condemn."

"When we read an article from the pen of a man whose language is vituperative, unkind, and damaging to the community in and from which he begs and bilks a support for himself and family, we are awe-stricken and stand aghast in wonder if it be the language of a demon sent from the rogue's refuge to harass and torment a good people, or if it is an unwelcome truth to be made shine in letters of gold. The duty of the community is to investigate, and if his charge is false, let the courts brand the author a liar; if true, let them crown him a hero and cleanse it of its filth!" These papers would not publish what I had to say, because they were afraid their subscribers would hurl anathemas on their tender heads.

Yours for truth, freedom from intellectual serfdom, and for humanity,

J. E. SCOTT.

Mount Ingersoll.

QUINAIULT, WASH., Dec. 16, 1894.

"O lead me to the rock. Lead me to the rock; lead me to the rock that is higher than I."

MR. EDITOR: Colonel Ingersoll probably does not know that away in western Washington, far beyond the sound of human voice, covered with snow that is nearly perpetual, there is a rock that is higher than himself.

Such a rock there is, and it bears his name, though, locally, it is known as "Colonel Bob." On the 23d day of July 1893, my son Robert and myself started for a mountain climb "for fun." We left my claim near the head of Lake Quinaiult about seven in the morning, and proceeded up the river in a canoe. About two miles from our starting-point we stopped at Mr. Clark Pealer's ranch, thinking to change boats, as ours leaked. Mr. Pealer thought he would have some fun too, and went with us. Two miles further up we landed and banked our boat, and ate a lunch, as it was about noon, then turning our backs to the river we crossed a wide gravel bar, and then about half a mile of bottomland densely covered with brush, in which huckleberries and bear-signs were plenty, to the foot of a steep bluff hedged about with "devil's club," a sort of vegetable covered with sharp spines which lies along the ground in a semicircular erection waiting to hit you in the face if you step on it.

Here the climbing began; first a thirty-foot, perpendicular bluff, soon surmounted by the help of the sword-ferns growing in the crevices; from thence the climb was through fairly open woods of fir, spruce, cedar, but principally hemlock, up all the time at an angle of about forty-five degrees, until we gained the backbone of the ridge, which we did about 3 o'clock P.M. Following this ridge we reached snow about four, and in a few minutes more came to a large field of the same. Here, for the first time, I beheld red snow, it was in stripes of a deep crimson. This field was a small one of not more than an acre in extent. Passing a rather ticklish place which we named the bridge, and on one side of which was certain death, and on the other side perdition, we began to learn what climbing was. We soon passed a small gap where the winter-beaten trees were so stunted and thick that my ax was in constant use. We came to another larger field of snow. Mr. Pealer climbed a small peak and, returning, informed us that "Baldy," the mountain we intended to climb, was not the highest—as it had always been reported to be—of the range between the Upper Quinaiult, and the Humptulips on the south. After a short consultation we agreed that our motto should be "Excelsior," and after some more argument as to route, in which the boys finally yielded to me as the more experienced mountaineer, we proceeded. Following the snow we started a deer, but Robert, who had the gun, was not in position to shoot, and he escaped. We found some pretty steep grades; some places where claws would have come in handy, and the ax had to be frequently used to cut away the mountain cedar. The final sharp climb was over a round, nearly smooth, rock, in some places perpendicular, and with few crevices and no vegetation. We left our packs and climbed the last hundred feet in about half an hour. Once on the top, "we watched the sun sink in the western wave." The boys went back and got the packs. I cut some wood—there was quite a grove down the east side of the mountain—we melted snow and made coffee, watching the view fast dissolving in the purple gathering night. To the west, the Pacific ocean enveloped in a brown coat of fog. South, Gray's harbor showed a white coat. North, the mountains on Vancouver island were visible; the straits and Puget Sound marked by white banks of fog. Far in the east Mt. Ranier glowed pink in the rays of the sun already set to us, while the white giants of the Olympic range seemed only a gunshot away. A few cedar boughs, and a good fire, completed our comfort, albeit we had little room; the flat portion of the top was surrounded by a rock-parapet, except on one side that grew full of mountain cedar.

Before retiring we noticed one clear electric light to the south, probably in one of the Gray's harbor towns. We slept well, but woke early, being rather short of blankets, and while eating breakfast the sun came up. Sometime I shall try to write up that sunrise; not now. But gray blankets of fog were slipping up the valleys as though alive, and we hurried our preparations; taking a sack that had held our provisions, we split it to make a flag, which we set in a pile of stones. It was then that the proposition was made to name the mountain. The boys deferred to the old man and, not knowing any higher character, I called it Mount Ingersoll, and we drank to him and it in coffee.

Writing an account of our proceedings, we placed it in a tin box in the stone ballast of our flag staff, and began the descent. We climbed Mount Baldy, but the fog had turned to a drizzle, and though we stayed several hours we got no view. Going down was easy. You have only to let go, though occasionally it is necessary to "grab on." We arrived at home about dusk, in this country at that season about 10 o'clock P.M. It is never dark here in midsummer, that is, not in clear weather. Subsequently, we took a party of ladies to the top of Baldy, the elevation of which, by the temperature of boiling water, I made to be about 4,500 feet, which nearly agrees with an aneroid reading taken by a party who were up this summer. Mount Ingersoll is about five hundred feet higher; it is the highest peak in that spur of the Olympics between the Quinaiult and Humptulips rivers; is situated in Chehalis county, about five miles in an air line, a little south of east from Lake Quinaiult, from the western portion of which the peak is visible. Our flag stood the storms of last winter, and was waving in August.

Our man also stood the storms of last winter. May he long continue in the land, and, as his namesake, the mountain, calmly overlooks the storms of the Pacific, so may he overlook the storms of life.

Children's Corner.

When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Shut-Eye Train.

Come, my little one, with me!
There are wondrous sights to see
As the evening shadows fall;
In your pretty cap and gown,
Don't detain
The Shut-Eye train—
"Ting-a-ling!" the bell it goeth,
"Toot-toot!" the whistle bloweth,
And we hear the warning call;
"All aboard for Shut-Eye Town!"

Over hill and over plain
Soon will speed the Shut-Eye train!
Through the blue where bloom the stars
And the Mother Moon looks down
We'll sway
To land of Fay—
Oh, the sights that we shall see there!
Come, my little one, with me there—
'Tis a goodly train of cars—
All aboard for Shut-Eye Town.

Swifter than the wild bird's flight,
Through the realms of fleecy light
We shall speed and speed away!
Let the night in envy frown—
What care we
How wroth she be!

To the Balow-land above us,
To the Balow folk who love us
Let us hasten while we may—
All aboard for Shut-Eye Town!

Shut-Eye Town is passing fair—
Golden dreams await us there;
We shall dream those dreams, my dear,
Till the Mother Moon goes down—
See unfold
Delights untold

And in those mysterious places
We shall see beloved faces,
And beloved voices hear
In the grace of Shut-Eye Town!

Heavy are your eyes my sweet,
Weary are your little feet—
Nestle closer up to me
In your pretty cap and gown;
Don't detain
The Shut-Eye train!

"Ting-a-ling!" the bell it goeth,
"Toot-toot!" the whistle bloweth—
Oh, the sights that we shall see!

Babyhood of the Earth.

It does seem strange to think of the earth as a great, fat, pudgy baby. But so it was. And it was a long, long time changing, growing, just like all babies. It kept running around its mother, the sun, and, by and by, the gases that played about it, two of them, at least, began to condense, and a change appeared on the baby's body. Water came, and it came boiling hot, and for many hundreds of years it boiled and bubbled from the body of the infant Earth. After awhile it began to cool, and produced what we call the ocean. Like all babies, the earth was incessantly in motion. It could not keep still a minute.

There were little dabs of land, here and there, a few feet above the moving, restless sea, which made the baby earth appear as if it had the measles, or chicken-pox, or some other baby ailment.

It was, perhaps, like the chemical powders which, after boiling a long time, fall out of solution, as salts of lime, potash, soda, etc. Some think a part of this chemical substance is seen in the very oldest of known rocks, that is, the Laurentian limestone of Canada, which is about thirty thousand feet in thickness. This is the rock in which Sir Wm. Logan thought he had discovered the remains of the first life on this planet—the Eozoon, which means the dawn of life. But recently, Eozoon has been proved untrue. This matter had been in dispute about thirty years, but it is now known to be only a figment of imagination.

The earth was still a restless, active thing, continually in motion, leaping, rolling, tumbling, over and over and over again. Its mamma, the great Sun, must have watched it with wonder. But she knew it would come out all right, only give it time. It was assuming shape, growing, changing, and it was in its nature to be active. And while it grew the years rolled on.

251 LAY ME LOW. 8 lines, 7s.

A. J. WADLIA.

1. Lay me low, my work is done; I am weary, lay me low;

Where the wild flowers woo the sun, Where the balm-y breezes blow;

Where the but-ter-fly takes wing, Where the aspens drooping grow;

Where the young birds chirp and sing, I am weary, let me go.

2 I have striven hard and long
In the world's unequal fight,
Always to resist the wrong,
Always to maintain the right;
Always with a stubborn heart
Taking, giving blow for blow;
Brothers, I have played my part—
I am weary, let me go.

3 Shield and buckler, hang them up,
Drape the standard on the wall;
I have drained the mortal cup
To the finish, dregs and all.
When my work is done, 'tis best
To let all my troubles go;
I am weary, let me rest—
I am weary, lay me low.

Correspondence.

DEL NORTE, COL., Jan. 9, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will now take the pleasure of writing to the Children's Corner. I suppose you have forgotten me by this time, but I have not forgotten you. It has been two years since I last wrote to the Corner. I have a little brother eight months old; his name is Theodore. I am fifteen years old, and I ride horseback, and this winter I am learning to skate. I do not go to any public school, but mamma teaches me at home. Well, I will close, hoping to see this in print. I remain, as ever, Your friend, OLIVE L. JEROME.

[Do not wait so long before you write again, Olive. Now is the time to learn, and, by and by, you will have to teach that little baby brother.—Ed. C. C.]

CHILLICOTHE, O.

MISS S. H. WIXON: The two childish letters herein sent to the Corner, are by two of the sweetest little girls in all the country side. (They are mine, you know.) I looked over the letters, and dropped a comma here and there; but, otherwise, they are just as they came from the children's unformed minds. These letters may encourage others to try in their weak, childish ways. We sometimes see letters in the Corner purporting to have been written by a five- or a six-year-old, which would have done credit to a head whitened by the falling snows of sixty winters. To say the least, such letters are discouraging to little folks, who do not know (as, of course, you and I do) that said letters were not penned by a five-year-old. This letter is not intended for publication, but you may use it if you wish. It might serve as a hint to some.

Yours for liberty and justice,
JAMES POE CRYDER.

[We are sure they are treasures, and you have reason to be proud of them. A child, unfettered by superstition, cannot help being a credit to its parents.—Ed. C. C.]

DEAR MISS WIXON, AND CORNER FRIENDS: I go to school. Our teacher's name is Charles Elmer Stiglar. He is a Christian. He will not let anybody speak anything but Christian pieces. All of the pupils have leagued together, and there are going to be but three to get pieces, and they are Christians. Three out of forty. The teacher copied a piece for two of my cousins, and their mother would not let them learn them; she burned them. I am nine years old. I have a brother and sister. My sister's name is Maud; my brother's name is Olad. To-day has been dark and dismal; the water came down and drenched everything. About evening, the sun came out, and over on France's hill, when the sun was shining, it looked very beautiful. If any of the children would write to me, I would answer.

Your Liberal friend,
GENEVINE ERMINE CRYDER.

[The teacher ought to let his pupils exercise their judgment in learning pieces to speak. You and Maud are lovely girls, because somebody has told us so, and we want you to write to the Corner often.—Ed. C. C.]

DEAR MISS WIXON, AND CORNER FRIENDS: It has been fifteen months since I last wrote. Last summer, during the drouth, my cousins came to see me, and we took a hymn book or two, and got them and my brother and sister to climb up in the hay-mow, and we sang psalms, and had a lot of fun singing, and then (just for fun) we prayed for rain. This was Sunday, and on Monday we had a goose "drownder." We were playing Sunday-school. I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER about tom-toms, and thought this would correspond with that account. We take that paper, and also Mrs. Waisbrooker's valuable paper. Ma sent for a copy of the Little Free-thinker last Saturday, and when she goes to town I expect she will get it. If anyone should wish to write to me, I would gladly answer. Please address, Maud Ethel Cryder, in care of James Poe Cryder, Chillicothe, O. I shall always be a Freethinker.

Your Freethinking friend,
MAUD E. CRYDER.

[Maud is not forgotten, although it is a long time since she wrote before. She is one of our jewels.—Ed. C. C.]

CROSBY, TEX., Jan. 16, 1895.

MISS SUSAN WIXON—Dear Friend: I will attempt to write again, as it has been a good while since I wrote last. THE TRUTH SEEKER failed to have the Children's Corner in it this week. It looks as if the children might write a little oftener to the Corner than they do. My father has "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and Colonel Ingersoll's lecture, "About the Holy Bible," and THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I think they are the best books I ever read. I wish we could get Colonel Ingersoll to lecture here, but there are not enough people to pay him to come, this place is so thinly settled, but I hope it will settle up enough for us to have a good school, if nothing else. I have a good laugh, every time THE TRUTH SEEKER comes, over those cartoons of Watson Heston's. Well, the pious parson stands a poor show here; he has no place to preach unless he preaches in some one's dwelling-house, and I guess he is afraid the Lord wouldn't recognize him if he didn't preach in a regular church.

Your Liberal friend, BELLE HARVEY.

[Next to listening to Colonel Ingersoll is to read his lectures. A town without a parson in it must be a good place in which to live. Try and study at home, Belle, if there is no school. You can learn studying by yourself.—Ed. C. C.]

ZALESKI, O., Dec. 24, 1894.

MISS SUSAN WIXON—Dear Friend: Four or five years ago I wrote a few letters to the Children's Corner, and as I do not see many letters in the Corner at present I have concluded to write again.

I live in a town of about six hundred inhabitants; three or four years ago we had a population of about eleven hundred. Nearly all the men worked at the B. & O. S. W. R. R. shops and at the coal-mines, operated by the Zaleski Co. The shops have been moved to Chillicothe, and the Zaleski Co. has gone out of business. The only industry now carried on is the cutting of timber and the making of staves and hoop-poles. But we still have our usual number of churches—one Catholic, one Methodist, and one Baptist. We have five stores and four saloons in town. If something new does not start up soon, some of these will have to close up.

I am fifteen years old, and do not go to school, but study at home. I study reading, writing, arithmetic, spelling, geography, grammar, history, physiology, and shorthand. A month or two ago I took a trip to Pennsylvania, to visit some of my relatives. I went to Pittsburg, and from there about sixty miles up the Monongahela river, to Rice's Landing, where my relatives live. I had my first boat ride on the Monongahela river, which was quite a treat. I enjoyed my visit very much.

The weather is very fine for this time of the year; we have not had any cold weather yet. Yours for Freethought, OLELIE JAMES.

[It is gratifying to know that Orlie has not forgotten the Corner during the past years. Do write oftener.—Ed. C. C.]

NOW—THE TIME TO MAKE MONEY!

Last month I cleared, after paying all expenses, $175.48; the month before, $149.93, and have at the same time attended to my regular business. I believe anyone, anywhere, can do as well, as I have not a particularly good location and no experience. When you have an article that every family wants, it is very easy selling it. It seems strange that a good, cheap Dish Washer was never before placed on the market. With the Climax, which sells at $5.00 you can wash and dry the dishes for a family in two minutes, without putting the hands in water; as soon as people see the Washer work, they want one, and that is why so much money can be made so quickly. For full particulars, address the Climax Mfg. Co., Columbus, Ohio. I feel convinced that any lady or gentleman, in any location, can make from $5 to $10 a day, as every family will very soon have a Dish Washer. Try it, and publish your experience for the benefit of others.

A TALE OF A HALO.

The Truth Seeker Company has published a work entitled "A Tale of a Halo," which deserves more than a passing notice. It is a poem which lovers of Lucille will at once recognize as in the meter of their favorite. The author, Mr. Morgan A. Robertson, is a new writer, but a courageous champion of Freethought, a profound admirer of the true, the beautiful, and the sublime, wherever found, and those who know him best consider him one of the most promising of our new school of writers.

The artist has done his work well and has furnished illustrations which are at once very explanatory of the text. The work shows the absurdity of the whole Christian hierarchy and angelology of heaven. It is high-toned, often sarcastic, and, throughout, amusing.

The story opens with St. Peter sitting by the gate of heaven smoking. It seems that somebody had interdicted his smoking inside of the gate because "The smoke from that pipe had a smell of its own,

Too strong for the incense that hung
'round the Throne."

This had disgruntled St. Peter,

"He picked up his pipe, his tobacco and stool
With a grunt of disgust at the new-fangled rule,
And passed through the portal of jasper and gold
Where smoking was not by the by-law controlled.

'Strikes me,' quoth the saint, 'such a rule would work better
If posted in Hell and observed to the letter.'
And filling and lighting this pipe as he spoke
He seated himself for a good quiet smoke."

While he was thus seated, a very dignified person approaches. So dignified is he that he scarcely condescends to notice the saint, and when the latter asserts himself and demands his credentials, begins an argument which ends in his gaining admittance to heaven. Once inside, the stranger develops a very fastidious taste as to his outfit, and the more trouble is given because, ages ago, the mechanics had all been banished to hell.

The author has expressed this in a peculiarly happy manner:

"He needed no hymn-book, but as for the rest
Of his outfit, he wanted it 'made by the best
Of the workmen and tailors that Heaven contained.
And to order'—but here was a hitch;
there remained
Not one of that skillful and dextrous band
Of angel mechanics whose genius had planned,
And gathered, and built from the chaos of Night
This beautiful, glorious City of Light;
And also had furnished some outfits for souls
Who could capture a place on the heavenly rolls.

For ages ago they had shown their dislike
Of working so hard and had gone on a strike Under Satan, but failed in their object, for —well,
They all became devils residing in Hell.
Since then when the angels or spirits had done
Any damage in Heaven, a cherub would run
With a notice to Satan, who'd rout from their lairs
Some devils and send them to make the repairs."

Being finally fitted out to his taste, he sallied forth to join the heavenly choir, where he soon found himself the center of discord and jealousies equal to anything on earth. When he started to sing no one would join him, and everybody regarded him with unfavorable eyes.

"If he could have such a fine outfit, why could not the rest?"

The archangel Michael was not very busy that day and was sauntering around the celestial city. He took a good look at the new-comer when he at once recognizes in him Beelzebub, Satan's lieutenant.

Realizing that it is all up with him Beelzebub knocks Michael down with his halo, smashes his harp and crown, and amid a cloud of sulphurous fumes, changes to the shape of a devil and sails aloft with Michael and the whole heavenly army in pursuit, but no one can catch him. The author discourses on this point as follows:

"How this should so happen, I really can't tell;
But they were outflown by a devil from hell.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO., 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

The reason may be, that the devils had worked
While living in Hell, and the angels had shirked
And lain around Heaven with nothing to do
But daily to welcome a spirit or two.
And the watching of fires and the tossing of coals
With the details attending the roasting of souls
Will strengthen the muscles, and this may explain
How all of their efforts to catch him were vain."

The angel Gabriel gets within reach of the powerful fiend and is hurled, with "a furious flapping of wings, to the ground."

The chase is given up at this stage; Michael musters his forces and convenes a council of war.
Meanwhile the fiend pounces on St.

Peter, a passive, but much interested, spectator of the strange drama, and, in spite of howls and prayers, carries him high in the air. Involuntarily he makes the sign of the cross. He is dropped, fortunately, in the River of Life, and betakes himself to his post at the gate, possessed of the secret which will overcome the fiend, and resolved to wait until others had suffered from the devilish pranks. Then he would drive the infernal visitor out and obtain the credit.

Beelzebub, enraged by his experience with St. Peter, charges on the council of war which "consisted of Michael and most of his angels, and also some saints from the host,

Who down on the earth had perfected a plan
For casting out devils;"

Scatters it, and then swoops down on the legion of glorified souls, none of whom had remembered the sign of the cross, so omnipotent on earth. The onslaught is graphically described:

"And on went the fiend in his terrible might
Through the ranks of the host. 'Twas a sickening sight
As he felled them by dozens, with broad sweeping blows
Of his black horny wings, leaving rows upon rows
Of the stricken behind him; they scattered and fled
With loud screams of terror, and soon they were spread
To the uttermost bounds of the place, still pursued
By that demon of wrath. Before long he had strewn
The ground with nine-tenths of the glorified souls—
The other one-tenth had got into some holes."

St. Peter enjoys this scene hugely, and is more than pleased when the devil sets fire to heaven. The antiquated fire-engine is inadequate to meet the emergency, and the "mansions in the skies" are soon a mass of smoking ruins. At this juncture, as the saint resolves to show his power, St. Patrick, who has been down on earth celebrating his birthday, approaches the gate in the unsteady, but pugnacious, condition of a great many others who celebrate their birthdays. St. Peter apprises him of the trouble inside, and finding that St. Patrick is also aware of the wonderful power of the sign of the cross, tries to keep him out. This angers St. Patrick, the argument waxes hot until, at last—

"Biff!
The stick of St. Patrick descended, and if The head that it struck had been softer, 'tis clear
The blow would have finished St. Peter's career.
But the stick flew in pieces, then hammer and tongs
The saints went to fighting. Such conduct belongs
To the regions of hell; I, in fact, do not care
To describe the details of this shocking affair;
A very disgraceful proceeding; forsooth, I speak of it only for love of the truth!"

St. Patrick conquers his colleague, let's himself in with the key, interrupts a conversation between the archangel and Beelzebub, and making the puissant sign under the nose of the fiend causes him to sink to the ground in hopeless terror. Then he seizes Gabriel's horn, lifts the infernal foe to his feet by his tail, and belaboring him over the head and back with the horn, chases him toward the gate.

St. Peter, in a frenzy of chagrin, slams the gate in their faces, and heaven's great legion bears down on the discomfited enemy, each one making the sign of the cross on his breast.

There is a furious crush, and St. Patrick gets most of the blows intended for Beelzebub. Michael, disgusted at the exhibition, resolves to end it.

"And spreading his pinions, he soon was above
The struggling exponents of kindness and love,
Where, gauging his distance, he dropped to the ground

And elbowed a circle of space close around
The merciless saint and his victim: he held
His fist to the nose of St. Patrick, and yelled,

'Let go of that tail and that horn—I insist!'

'Will ye moind yer own business?' said Patrick. The fist
Drew back and returned with the sickening crash

Of a battering ram on the jaw of the rash
And unhappy St. Patrick, who, dropping the horn

And the tail, by the terrible impulse, was borne

Full forty feet off, where, unconscious, he lay
Along with three others who stood in the way."

Beelzebub escapes to the ramparts, beckons Michael up to him, and in a ringing speech gives him his private opinion of the workings of the Christian religion as exemplified in the Roman Catholic church and tells him to beware of the canonized saints who defy his command.

He is then frightened off into "outer darkness" by the indomitable St. Peter, who, seeing a lull in the proceedings, has approached and made him the sign.

Heaven is rebuilt and reorganized. Michael makes policemen of his angels and they keep the glorified souls in their seats. The story closes with the following:

"And the host could now sing, and be glad, but—alas!
Saints Peter and Patrick don't speak as they pass;
A very unfortunate state of affairs,
Increasing a little the Archangel's cares.
And preventing me too, ere resigning my pen,
From saying that peace was in Heaven again."

Do you know our savior, Jesus Christ, was a carpenter?" THE story is told of a colored preacher, who had not shown special aptitude for the work, that in a denominational gathering he narrated his experiences, including his alleged call to the ministry. He said that he had a vision and saw on the sky the golden letters, "G. P. C.," which he interpreted to mean, "Go preach Christ." After he had finished his remarks, another brother arose and said that he had no doubt that his brother had the vision that he described, but there might be a question about the interpretation of those letters. "I believe," said he, "that 'G. P. C.' meant, 'Go pick cotton.'"

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

impression. He astounded his good mother the other night by saying, "Mamma, I'm going to church to-night to be converted." "Converted, Jimmy? Why, you do not understand what it means." "Yes, I do; and I am going to join the church and be a Christian hereafter." "If you do that, you must give up dancing and going to the museum." "What is that? Must I quit going to the museum?" "Oh, yes." "Then," after a minute or two of earnest reflection, "I guess I'll go down and see the four-legged woman just once more before I am converted."

CAIN'S WIFE.

Where did he get her?
Who was her brother?
Had she a sister?
Had she a mother?
Was she pre-Adamic?
Born before history?
With her identity
Shrouded in mystery?
Maid of Phenicia
Egypt, Arabia,
Africa, India,
Or sun-kissed Snabia?
Who was her father?
Was he a Viking,
Cruising about
Just to his liking
Out of the wholeness
Over the water?
Into the where Bringing his daughter?
Nativ of Norway,
Denmark or Sweden,
Lured by the charms
Of the Garden of Eden?
Blonde or brunet,
Rounded or slender;
Fiery or frigid,
Haughty or tender?
Why are her graces
Unknown to fame?
Where did Cain meet her?
What was her name?
Whisper it softly.
Say can it be
The lady we seek Was it R. Haggard's "She?"
Tell me, ye sages,
Students of life,
Answer my query:
Who was Cain's wife?

Gems of Thought.

GRATITUDE is the memory of the heart.—Massieu.

EVERY philosopher is cousin to an Atheist.—A. de Musset.

JEALOUSY is the homage that inferiority pays to merit.—Mme. de Pusisien.

EVERY heroic act measures itself by its contempt of some external good.—R. W. Emerson.

DURING a certain period each member must receive benefits in proportion to its incapacity. After that period, it must receive benefits in proportion to its capacity.—Herbert Spencer.

DEGRADATION has been thoroughly tried, with its maimings and brandings, and the result was that those who inflicted the punishments became as degraded as their victims.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

ONE might as well attempt to calculate mathematically the contingent forms of the tinkling bits of glass in a kaleidoscope as to look through the tube of the future and foretell its pattern.—Beecher.

EDUCATE; extend the area of mental cultivation; broaden your acres of investigation. The harvest is already in the hand that plants. The soil cannot be cheated into productivity.—Horace L. Traubel.

Is it not true that Truth gets well if she is run over by a locomotive, while Error dies of lockjaw if she scratches her finger? I never heard of a mathematician being alarmed for the safety of a demonstrated proposition, and I think that the dread of discussion generally implies feebleness of inward conviction.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

FROM the orthodox or the semi-orthodox come all the querulous misgivings as to the natural foundations of duty; all the assertions that the reasonableness of selfish license and selfish tyranny begin to appear. Orthodoxy it is which in our time has reason to feel its own moral ground shaking under its feet, and consequently orthodoxy it is which, at any critical juncture, loses alike its faith in principle, and its hope in patience, and falls into action that is intemperate, irrational, sectarian, inhumane.—Miss L. Bevington, in Fortnightly Review.

"LEAVES OF GRASS" is a monument to the faith of one man in himself, and in his essential purity and divinity inside and out. And this man's faith in himself is his faith in all men. What he claims for one he claims for all. "What I assume you shall assume, for every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you." In celebrating himself he celebrated humanity, and in identifying himself with criminals and offenders of all sorts he declares his universal brotherhood with all men. He does not give us charity, and liberty, and fraternity, and equality, as sentiments; he gives us the reality, and the reality is more than most people can stand. The sentiment of these things is very pretty, and we all love it and admire it, but the flesh and blood reality puts us to flight.—John Burroughs.

THE spirit of persecution seems not to have thoroughly departed from our country. In Maryland the Seventh-day Adventists are persecuted in a manner that ought to arouse the indignation of every American citizen irrespective of his race or creed. Why, these poor people are surrounded by mobs when they are worshipping, pelted and pounded, and in one instance the Adventist minister had to fly for his life. In other instances arrests of Adventists have been made for working on Sunday. This is an outrage upon all that our Constitution and our civilization guarantee. In all this be it said in honor of the Catholics, not a Catholic has been known to interfere with these honest worshippers. Protestants are the persecutors. Shame on Protestantism, that such crimes can truthfully be charged up to it.—Progressive Age.

THE very common mental confusion which regards things evil as only good pressed too far, is continually shown in the common phrase about "liberty degenerating into license." That is taking the name of liberty in vain. You cannot press a good principle too far. Liberty cannot degenerate into licentiousness; not any more than a diamond can degenerate into glass. Liberty can only be ascribed to a man as a member of society, and means his right to seek happiness, to develop his nature, to do his duty, all to the best of his ability—in fact, his right to be a man—without hindrance from others or from the community, to whose well-being he is loyal. By its very essence, therefore, liberty can never mean the destruction of others' liberty, the sway of brute force, or selfish defiance of the public welfare.—Moncure D. Conway.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a running sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces. We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free. F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O. (1000 STANZAS)

A Poem of Justice and of Liberty.

By J. L. TREUTHART, B.L.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

Books by SALADIN.

Editor of the London Agnostic Journal.

GOD AND HIS BOOK.

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold letter's, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

CHRISTIANITY and the SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and Science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAUE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN AND REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardner's story 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" Paper, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

THE treasury reserve of gold continues to decrease rapidly. Part that is taken out is for export, and the rest apparently for domestic hoarding. The reserve is lower than ever before. President Cleveland sends a special message to Congress recommending the retirement of legal tenders and treasury notes, the issuance of $500,000,000 of fifty year, 3 per cent gold bonds, the payment of duties in gold alone, permission to the banks to issue notes of not less than $10 to face value of bonds deposited except 2 per cents, and the replacing of silver certificates of $10 and over by silver certificates of less denominations.

THE Brooklyn trolley car strike continues. An increasing number of the lines have been run from day to day, but at no time have the cars put out equaled half of the total usually run. About seven thousand soldiers were on guard to Jan. 29, and a largely augmented police force. Some of the linemen have gone out to aid the motor-men. It is generally stated that but a comparatively small portion of the violence—of which there has been a great deal—was committed by the strikers. Most of it is laid to the charge of the criminal classes of the two cities. Two men have been killed, neither of them strikers or rowdies. To date the non-union men, soldiers, policemen, and citizens have been the principal sufferers, so far as physical injuries are concerned. Judge Gaynor has issued an alternative mandamus, returnable in twenty days, requiring the Brooklyn Heights Company to show cause why its charter should not be forfeited through its failure to maintain its lines in usual running order. On the night of Jan. 28 the First Brigade was withdrawn. Severe rioting ensued, and the police had sharp fights with rioters.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. A New Book by Huxley.

EVOLUTION AND ETHICS, AND OTHER ESSAYS. By Thomas H. Huxley. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Cloth, 12mo., 333 pp. Price, $1.25.

This volume is No. 9 of the Collected Essays of Mr. Huxley, and contains five chapters, made up of these papers: "Evolution and Ethics. Prolegomena" [1894]; "Evolution and Ethics" [1893]; "Science and Morals" [1886]; "Capital—the Mother of Labor" [1890]; "Social Diseases and Worse Remedies" [1891], consisting of "Preface," "The Struggle for Existence in Human Society," "Letters to the Times," "Legal Opinions," "The Articles of War of the Salvation Army."

In the first essay of this book Professor Huxley remarks that "the greatest restrainer of the anti-social tendencies of men is fear, not of the law, but of the opinion of their fellows. The conventions of honor bind men who break legal, moral, and religious bonds." Every step in advance in social growth brings men into more close relations with their fellows, "and increases the importance of the pains and pleasures derived from sympathy." The evolution of the feelings here indicated (those feelings being the material out of which the primitive bonds of society are so largely forged) "into the organized and personified sympathy we call conscience," Mr. Huxley denominates the "ethical process." Of it he says: "So far as it tends to make any human society more efficient in the struggle for existence with the state of nature or with other societies, it works in harmonious contrast with the cosmic process. But it is none the less true that, since law and morals are restraints upon the struggle for existence between men in society, the ethical process is in opposition to the principle of the cosmic process, and tends to the suppression of the qualities best fitted for success in that struggle."

In the chapter, entitled "Capital—the Mother of Labor," the economic problem is considered from a physiological point of view, and the positions of Henry George are attacked in a very aggressive fashion. Altogether, "Evolution and Ethics" is one of the most interesting and thought-provoking of the series, which is not faint praise, for Mr. Huxley is always readable, even if one is not in every instance able to accept his conclusions. It is a great pity that books of this class are not more widely read. What Sunday newspaper or newspaper syndicate will be the pioneer of a movement for the popularization of scientific, sociological, and economic literature that is something better than trash?

Something QUITE NEW & UNIQUE THE BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dived into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

“FREETHOUGHT IN THE UNITED STATES:
1891-1894.”

Next Week.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 16 JOHN PROCK will have something to say about

“THE CHURCH AND ITS METHODS—ITS POWER AND ITS WEAKNESS.”

A Governor Shocks Some Ministers.

Governor Fishback of Arkansas recently expressed an opinion as to the proper way to deal with certain social wrongs, and for this opinion was severely called to account by the Pastors' Association of Little Rock. He addressed a reply to them in the form of an open letter, in which, while claiming to be more deeply interested in religion and morality than they were, he excoriated them very deftly; in effect telling them that they did not know anything about the matters concerning which they presumed to set themselves up as authorities, and intimating that they could not truthfully give themselves as good a certificate of character as he therein wrote out for himself. In the course of his letter he introduced a bit of history to illustrate his central contention. He said:

“Some years ago, about the middle of the eighteenth century, there was some swamp land east of Edinburgh, in Scotland, whose miasmas during each spring bred diseases and death among the farmers. The more sensible people of the community petitioned the authorities to have the swamp land drained. The pastors of the neighborhood, who, we may safely assume, were of a pattern similar to the authors of your resolutions, protested to the premier of England against what they termed a sacrilegious blasphemy. These diseases and deaths said they, are visitations of divine providence upon the people for their sins, and for the state to interfere was an insult to the deity. The prime minister, however, was a man of sense, and he ordered the swamp drained. As a natural consequence the diseases disappeared and the visitations of the Lord ceased.”

Inquiring as to the cause of the slow progress of moral reformation, the governor asks the preachers if they know why this is, and he says: “Intelligent, sensible people, who are at all observant of passing events, will tell you that the chief obstacle in the way of religious and moral progress has been hypocrisy and folly. A few men who arrogate to themselves leadership in religious and moral reforms are constantly bringing both into contempt, either through hypocrisy or blind, fanatical, unreasoning folly.” Then he tells the ministers whom he is addressing that they are of this class, that he appreciates the situation fully, did not expect them to sanction the views he had expressed, and hence is not at all surprised at their resolutions. Following this he observes that one of his saddest reflections in connection with “our holy religion” is that “in too many instances its direction is falling into the hands of narrow-minded men. If there is another regret, sadder still, it is that the more sensible portion of our Christian ministry seems powerless to assume its leadership.” And he closes with these words: “I am, with all the respect I can enforce myself to feel, very truly yours.”

The governor appears to us to be looking at the wrong side of the shield; he fails to see that it is himself who has moved, instead of the ministers whom he censures. He has gone forward more than they have retrograded. He has to a certain extent freed himself from the dominion of superstition and stepped out beyond the church. He is less rather than more Christian than the ministers, and when he gets rid, if he should, of the absurd faith he has in a God who does nothing for the relief of those whom Governor Fishback pities he will be still better qualified to point out the delinquencies of the clergy. After all, it is the creed, a survival from ages of appalling darkness, which is the stumbling-block in the way to better conceptions and conditions.

Church Taxation Agitation in Wisconsin.

It is expected that the present legislature of Wisconsin will be called upon to face the question of taxation of church property, and the state is ringing with the discussion of the important subject. The papers are talking about it, the ministers are giving from their pulpits their opinions pro and con, and some of the churches are opening to lay debate upon the issues presented. This last feature is perhaps the most remarkable of all, for when the church becomes the arena of debate, especially on such a subject, we may be sure that the leaven of free inquiry has worked its way through the whole mass of society.

We learn from the Milwaukee Sentinel that on the evening of January 23 there was a discussion of this question in the Hanover Street Congregational church of that city, participated in by City Clerk Anderson and L. W. Halsey, an attorney; Mr. Anderson arguing for taxation and Mr. Halsey for the continuance of exemption. The latter gentleman seems to have been very much confused in his thought, as will hereafter appear. He said that the constitution forbade an established church and a religious test as to citizenship, but “the state constitution began by saying that the people were ‘grateful to Almighty God for our freedom,’ continuing by according every man the right ‘to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience,’ and assuring every man that he should not be compelled to ‘attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent.’ It provided that ‘no preference be given by law to any religious establishments,’ nor should ‘any money be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies,’ etc. He said that it would be seen that while the church and state were apparently divorced, there was nevertheless breathed into the constitution the sentiment and purpose of maintaining religion and encouraging religious education.” Were it not for the constitutional acknowledgment of the god-fetich, that disjunctive “but” would be entirely out of place where used by Mr. Halsey, for all the other clauses quoted by him from the state constitution are distinctly inhibitive of the union of church and state, as anyone not religion-blind can see at a glance. By what peculiar process of self-delusion can a reputable lawyer gain his own consent to contend for the exemption of church property from taxation in face of the constitution’s explicit denial of the right of the state to compel any citizen to “attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry,” or to permit any money to be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies? After reading what he quoted from the constitution, by what mental legerdemain can he reach the conclusion that in Wisconsin church and state are only “apparently divorced” (if the constitution is obeyed), and that there is “breathed into the constitution the sentiment and purpose of maintaining religion and encouraging religious education”? Does he indeed know so little of law, and is his comprehension of the meaning of words so limited, that he cannot realize the difference between protecting the citizen in his right to worship or to abstain from worship and maintaining religion by the state? Does he think that protection and maintenance (support) are synonymous?

Mr. Halsey took occasion to repeat and emphasize his assertion that the separation of church and state is only apparent, and he added that “there is no real severance; in fact, there is a charming unity.” Again we deny that the Constitution of the United States or the constitutions of most of the states provide for or even tolerate such a union. It is readily conceded by well-informed theocrats—of whom Mr. Halsey does not appear to be one—that the principle of secularism is solidly entrenched in the organic law, and that therefore the task that is imposed upon them is the amendment of the fundamental instruments of the nation and the states so that the theocratic principle may be ingrafted thereon and the state and federal statutes which are in conflict with the existing prohibitions of these instruments may receive ex post facto legalization. There is indeed a “charming unity” between the politicians and the preachers, and they have conspired to disregard the constitution and feed the churches at the public crib, but all the legislative acts that authorize this diversion of public funds to sectarian uses are unconstitutional and void, and will be swept away as soon as the people awake to the fact that they are the victims of cabals of designing ecclesiastics and complaisant and self-seeking legislators. And they are awakening.

The Milwaukee lawyer instanced the kinds of property that are exempt from taxation in his state, including in the enumeration the property of the state itself. This is another evidence of his incapacity to grasp the problem—does he not know that for the state to tax its own property would be of no possible advantage to the taxpayers, as all the property that the state has—save grants from the federal government—is the product of the taxation of its own people? The man who increased his hoard by taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another, was just as wise as would be the state which should tax its own property. There is no possible parallel between the exemption of state property, the possession of all the people, and the exemption of the property of the church, the possession of private associations of the people. So long as compulsory contributions to the treasury of the state are exacted from the people there can be no justice in the exemption of churches or educational and charitable institutions not owned by all the citizens. It is useless to talk of the alleged gratuitous nature of the work of the churches and their auxiliary institutions. It is a matter of common notoriety that they are organized on a substantial business basis and that more money sticks in the pockets of their managers and employees, in the form of salaries, than goes out to relieve distress. This is natural; all complicated machinery is costly. It may do good work, or it may tend to the increase of dependence and pauperism and so ultimately result in adding to instead of subtracting from the burdens of the state, but there is no valid reason why all these institutions should not be placed on an equality before the law; the fittest will survive, and the taxation of all will help to determine which are the fittest. There is no middle ground between the equal and uniform taxation of all private property and the leaving of the state to be supported by voluntary contributions, as was once done in the case of the Free Cities of Germany. There is neither sense nor justice in taxing so-called secular property and exempting that of religious corporations.

Mr. Halsey tries to show that the state will gain nothing in a financial way by the taxation of church wealth, and in order to carry conviction to the minds of his hearers he did not hesitate to use statistics in a manner to suit himself first and last. He puts the total valuation of church property in the United States at $450,000,000, while the United States census says that it was $670,000,000 in 1890. That he had the true figures at hand is demonstrated by the fact that he gives the value of this kind of property in Wisconsin as $14,612,061, which is a little more than that given by the census. Then he makes his calculations on the basis of a one per cent tax, which is only about half the actual average annual rate of assessment. On this basis the receipts from the churches would be annually $1,340,000, instead of $450,000 as figured by Mr. Halsey, a difference in favor of taxation of almost three to one. The advocate of exemption asked how far the $450,000 which the states would receive according to his calculations would go "in comparison with the general work of religious associations?" and he added—"Why, the American Board of Foreign Missions expended roundly $500,000 the past year in carrying our civilization and Christianizing influences to foreign lands." The gentleman is wild. What has the state to do with the expenditures of the missionary societies? Why should it order its system of taxation with reference to the work those societies are doing in "heathen lands"? To do what he implies it should do would be to frankly vote a certain sum each year to the churches for the "Christianizing" of the Asiatic and African worlds. Of course we are voting money into the coffers of the church, but we try to disguise the fact by the foolish claim that exemption is not equivalent to appropriation. It has remained for Mr. Halsey to direct the scrutiny of the taxpayer to this very point, and he will have none but himself to thank if his address weakens instead of strengthens the hold of the church on the purse of the state. Every one must now see that the money which the churches save by the exemption of their property from taxation is really money voted out of the pockets of the individual taxpayers into those of the treasurers of the religious organizations. In the light of this undeniable fact what becomes of the guarantee of the constitution that no citizen shall be compelled to build or support a place of worship or contribute to the maintenance of a ministry? Why, Mr. Halsey even wants him to be forced to donate something for the support of foreign missions! No wonder he thinks that there is a "charming unity" of church and state in this country.

In conclusion, Mr. Halsey said that "the taxation of churches would work a revolution of our social economics and be a menace to our peace, an unjust burden to the generous and benevolent, a shock to all the moral sentiments of our citizens." The "revolution in our social economics" cannot come too soon, but it will be a revolution only in the sense that it will be a return to the sound principle of total separation of the civil and the ecclesiastical which was so wisely embodied in the Constitution, and that kind of a revolution will be warmly welcomed by all who desire justice and fear the encroachments of sacerdotalism. The taxation of the churches will not "be a menace to our peace," unless they mean to precipitate a rebellion if they are taxed. Do they? There would not be any "unjust burden" laid on the "generous and benevolent;" it must always be assumed that he who receives a gift is the one to pay for its protection rather than those who have not received it. When money or land is given to the churches, their adherents and not the non-church members of the community ought to pay the taxes that should be assessed against it, for they and not the others have the benefit of the property. It is futile to say that all share in the benefits which the church is supposed to confer. Each must judge for himself as to the advantage the church is to him; no one else is qualified to decide in the premises. If this plea of the exemptionist is sound, the same argument could be legitimately used to justify the direct appropriation to the church of money from the treasury of the state. As to the alleged "shock to the moral sentiments of our citizens," that talk is nauseating. A man whose "moral sentiments" are shocked by the proposal to lay the burdens of taxation upon the society that owns a piece of property instead of upon somebody who does not care for the society or its objects should hasten to supply himself with a set of civilized moral sentiments. The change will add greatly to the sense of security in the neighborhood.

The address of City Clerk Anderson was admirable in spirit and matter, and was a complete refutation of the arguments of Mr. Halsey and others of his school. We much regret that we do not have space for it in the THE TRUTH SEEKER. A good abstract of it appears in the Milwaukee Sentinel of January 24.

Late Movements of the Enemy.

Some little time ago the city council of Niagara Falls, New York, in response to a petition, set apart a portion of Erie avenue for the use of those citizens who wished to speed their horses. On a recent Sunday the sleighing was good, and so there were a number of the horsemen out enjoying themselves. There was no racing, no boisterousness, no betting. Nobody, apparently, had any cause to be disturbed by the recreation of the business and professional men who thus sought relaxation from their labors. But your average minister is always disturbed when he sees people having a good time on Sunday instead of listening to his dry sermonizing about something of which he knows no more than his unhappy auditors. It happened that the International Ministerial Association was in session at Niagara Falls that day and they could not let pass the opportunity to meddle in something which in no wise concerned them. They adopted some resolutions severely condemning the horsemen and calling upon the officials to rigorously enforce the law against "Sabbath breaking," quoting for their guidance the part of the penal code which we are striving to have repealed. They had the audacity to make this demand notwithstanding the fact that they were on the same day engaged in their regular business. Their resolutions were published and commented upon by the local papers. Then one of our subscribers, who was a participant in the "desecration" of the "Sabbath," sent a spirited, well-written, and argumentative protest to the Cataract. It was printed, accompanied by a fair but not particularly clear editorial. The next day the Gazette had a short editorial, evidently written by a clergyman or under the immediate dictation of one, which for cool impudence surpasses anything we have seen in a newspaper for some time. The action of the ministerial Association is indorsed and then this follows:

"There is no reason why the question should be argued. No one should ask for argument on the subject. The only thing to be done is to revoke the permit unless such occurrences as those of last Sunday are discontinued."

Of course the Sabbatarians want no argument; argument is fatal to them. How quickly they would muzzle the press as well as stop all amusements on their collection day!

"It is an insult to the local clergy; it is an insult to Christianity; it is a severe reflection on the city to print such a communication as that which appeared last night in a paper in this city. If the liberty granted to lovers of rapid driving by the council is destined to encourage the growth of the sentiments expressed in the communication referred to the permit should be repealed at once."

It is an insult to the local clergy to differ from them, to object to being deprived of the commonest rights of the citizen at their dictation! It has come to this that the ordinary member of the community has no rights that the minister of God is bound to respect—he must not even express his opinion in the newspaper. It is an insult to Christianity also to demand equality before the law! But why was the printing of our subscriber's letter a "severe reflection on the city"? How is the city responsible for his views or the expression of them? Are we to understand from this that the city should have forbidden the publication of such communications? It looks very much that way, especially when we read in the same connection the assertion that if the permission given to speed horses on Erie avenue tends to encourage the growth of the sentiments expressed by our friend that permission should be withdrawn. This is tantamount to the assertion that it is proper to prevent the growth of certain opinions regarding the observance of Sunday by punishing a class of citizen which is supposed to include those who entertain the obnoxious opinions. How free we should be with God in the Constitution and only Christian men in office!

In Connecticut the Sundayites are just now having things their own way. Bridgeport and Southington were first to feel the Puritanic wave, and there are not yet any indications of its receding. The movement is a concerted one, and is a part of a Sabbath crusade which is national in extent and is engineered from the headquarters of the Sabbath Union. This may not appear on the surface, but those who read the organs of the Sabbatarian and theocratic organizations are well aware that there is perfect harmony of purpose from Maine to California. It has been decided in the councils of the militant religious party that it will be easier to win the fight in detail than it will be to secure a national Sunday law at present. That is to come later. But to return to Connecticut: Every barber shop was closed in Bridgeport, and the Herald tells how those who had not shaved themselves for years were now obliged to do so and came to church with cut cheeks, scarred chins, and scratched throats. These do not deserve our pity. The man who will sneak away to church after it has thus tyrannized over him has not the spirit of a fly and deserves all the trouble he gets. Were it not for such slaves as these the Sunday laws would not remain on the statute books of a single civilized state another year. In Southington the raid is led by a Baptist minister named John C. Barker. There on a recent Sunday everything was closed except one barber shop, the proprietor of which, Jacob Heinrich, when notified by Barker that his place must be shut up, defied the minister to do it, and threatens retaliation if he is meddled with by the grand juror to whom Barker made a complaint against him. It seems that Barker rendered himself liable under the law, for after service he went to a livery man, hired a rig, and, with two strangers, drove about the city to see if anyone was violating the law! It is to be hoped that he will be brought up with a round turn for this. No Sunday papers were sold, to the intense disgust of the lovers of the newspaper. Many of the broader-minded citizens of these places threaten to go further than the ministers in the enforcement of the law, with the object of producing a reaction and securing its repeal.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat reports that Senator Orchard introduced in the legislature of that state a bill to enact a new section making more inclusive and severe the law against Sunday amusements and games. It reads as follows:

"Every person who shall be convicted of horse-racing, cock-fighting, playing cards, playing base-ball, playing at foot-ball, or games of any kind, or any person who shall manage or aid in the management of any such games, or who shall rent, lease, or allow buildings or grounds under their control to be used for such purposes, or any person who shall keep theaters or playhouses open on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined not less than $50 nor more than $500."

If this bill becomes a law Missouri will have one of the most intolerable Sunday statutes in the Union. In regard to its prospects, the Globe-Democrat says that members of the assembly who live in cities of any size do not favor it, but in many of the rural districts it is quite popular. The author of the measure is a lawyer, and lives in the village of West Plains. It seems to us that every interest of civilization demands that cities should have the right of self-government. Let them have the opportunity to show what greater freedom can do for mankind, and their example will stimulate the lagging outlying districts to push forward in the race. As it is now those who would forge ahead are held back by the others who will not, and thus all are kept down in the valley of darkness. The existing system is almost without exception an advantage to the reactionist and bigot and a handicap to the progressist and the Liberal.

Great Reductions in Standard Freethought Works.

The popularity of our missionary scheme, by which Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is being scattered broadcast by the thousands, has induced us to lower the price of his other works, with the hope that they too will have a wider reading. From this date the prices of Paine's books will be as follows:

AGE OF REASON. Paper, 25 cents. Eight copies sent to as many different addresses for $1. Cloth, 50 cents.

EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Paper, 15 cents.

COMMON SENSE. The argument that did more than any other to convince the Revolutionary leaders of the necessity of the separation of this country from Great Britain. Paper, 15 cents.

THE CRISIS. Paine's great Revolutionary writings. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Answer to Burke's attack on the French Revolution. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PAINE'S GREAT WORKS IN ONE VOLUME. 8vo., 800 pp., cloth, $3, leather $4, morocco, gilt edges, $4.50. This book and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $5.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. One volume containing Common Sense, Crisis, and Rights of Man. Cloth, $1.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. One volume containing Age of Reason, Examination of the Prophecies, Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff, Essay on Dreams, Letters, etc. With Life of Paine and steel portrait. Cloth, $1.

We hope all our readers will do their best to scatter these splendid works all over the country.

Dr. Talmage is nothing if not outré and sensational. In one of his late sermons in the Academy of Music he said, referring to the gospel of Luke: "That was written by a practicing physician and an inspired reporter named Luke. God bless all reporters, even though they are not inspired. God bless them." What an "anchor to windward" with the reporting fraternity! Talmage is a shrewd business man even if he did serve his God so unacceptably that that choleric gentleman burned his Tabernacle three times. He continued: "While Luke was not acquainted with modern stenography, his verbatim reports of what Jesus Christ said are wonderful." We should think they were, especially when we take into consideration the fact that he did not claim to do more than put into writing what had come down by tradition to his generation. But more wonderful than Luke's "verbatim reports" is Talmage's cool ignoring of the results of the researches of the scholars and critics of this age.

Mr. Farrell took the manuscript of Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on Voltaire to the printer last week, and that individual asseverated that it would all be in shape for the reader sometime this week. With due allowance for the fallibility of printers—whereof we know something ourselves—we believe the pamphlet will be ready about the time this reaches the readers of this paper. It will be in the same handsome style as "Shakspeare" and "Lincoln," and the price will be the same—25 cents. We shall have a supply at the earliest moment, and hope to have many orders to fill therefrom.

We wish our readers would look at the date on their wrappers and see if they do not owe us a renewal. If they find they do, it will be a great favor to us if they will forward it at their earliest convenience, as we need the money. Owing to various causes, more than the usual number are in arrears at present, and this embarrasses us financially, or we wouldn't mention it. We like to keep square with the world, and in order that we may do this it is necessary that our readers keep square with us, for when they let their subscriptions run behind we have to get behind with others. We have no capital to fall back upon, and depend upon getting our dues to give others their due. If our friends who are in arrears will note these facts and act thereupon, it will be, as we have said, a great favor to us, and a favor duly and thankfully appreciated.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week address their communications to the editor of the Penny Press, a daily of Minneapolis, Minn. Commenting editorially upon the address of Archbishop Ireland in response to the recent lecture of Colonel Ingersoll in that city, the Minneapolis paper says, in part:

"Ireland may not know any more about God, the Bible or its inspired origin, than Ingersoll—and he probably does not, for Ingersoll is as great a student as Ireland. The difference is, however, that Ireland is willing to take some things for granted; and in the absence of all other information, in the light of all the research of the literature of the world, is willing to admit that a doctrine which tends to elevate mankind, to advance civilization, to assist humanity in this world, and to prophesy an eternal life of progress hereafter is certainly a much safer person to follow, a much more desirable teacher from whom to receive instructions, than he who, without offering any substitute, undertakes to overthrow the bulwark of our civilizations, to destroy every hope of the future, and to substitute for a faith in a brighter, better, and more progressive hereafter, nothing but death, despair, and annihilation."

Show that the prudent man will not "take for granted" that for which there is no analogy in his own experience or the authenticated experience of the race; that the Christian doctrine has not, on the whole, tended to "elevate mankind, to advance civilization, to assist humanity in this world," and that its alleged prophecy of "an eternal life of progress hereafter" has been for the few only whose minds were capable of accepting as true the ridiculous dogmas of the church. In this connection we want to say that we are encouraged by the lengthening of the enrollment list of the Corps and hope to receive many more names within a very short time.

Mr. F. M. Holland (on page 86) referring to the statement of the Evening Post that the saloon is the only place where the poor man can meet and converse with his fellows on terms of equality, and in comfort, cogently argues that if the law permitted the small shops where papers, cigars, stationery, groceries and other similar articles are sold, to be open on Sunday they would be convenient meeting places and would keep large numbers out of the saloons. This is very true, but just see the attitude toward such common-sense arrangements which is taken and doggedly held by the Sabbatarians! As noted in these columns at the time, the city council of Williamsport, Pa. (immediately after a convention of the National Reform Association had been held in that town), passed a new ordinance which made it a misdemeanor for a tradesman to permit his neighbors to gather in his place of business on Sunday. This, understand, was made a distinct offense, regardless of whether the store or shop was or was not open for purposes of trade. Could bigoted stupidity go further? It is because the church, whenever she has had the necessary power, has always acted in this blindly tyrannical way that we say she has proved herself to be the unrelenting enemy of civilization. In this age she has for the time being wrecked the temperance movement on the rocks of despotism fanaticism.

The fall and winter being more particularly the reading season, and naturally the renewing of subscription season, we hope that our friends will make a little effort to send THE TRUTH SEEKER some new subscribers. A good many of our old ones have had to drop off during the past eighteen months of panic and dullness in the business world, and we need some more to take their places and push on the work. Our friends have never failed us in an emergency, and we again venture to ask them to do something to help by inducing new subscriptions. We have tried to make this easy by the premium offers printed on the second page of this paper, and we think considerable can be done by our friends if they will take the trouble to speak a good word for us to their Liberal acquaintances.

To those who feel like presenting THE TRUTH SEEKER for a short time to some dear friend, our Trial Subscription offer opens the way at a small cost. A great many of the Liberals to whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is first sent this way become permanent subscribers and earnest workers in the cause of mental liberty.

And lastly, after you have induced some acquaintance to subscribe, and sent THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to some friend, send us the names of all the Liberals you know, and we will send them sample copies, and see if they, too, will not subscribe. We need them all.

A minister of Spokane is very much exercised about our genial acquaintance, Santa Claus. He says that he is an "old Roman Catholic myth of past ages," and it is a sin to keep up a pretense of his beneficence in Christmas time. We ourselves think that it is foolish to delude the minds of trusting children with this fiction, but the arguments of our ministerial friend almost convince us that the delusion may bear more good fruit than bad. He says that this belief causes many children to be thinking of Santa Claus "when they ought to have Christ uppermost in their minds." Furthermore, it is urged that when after a while the child finds out that there is no such being as Santa Claus he may ask, "What of the devil?" adding, "Perhaps he too is a myth." The good man cannot bear to give up his dear devil, evidently oblivious of the fact that the dark gentleman is as dead as the other old gods of "heathendom," so far as the advanced Christian world is concerned. But he did not dare express all that was quite evidently in his mind. It is very probable that he felt that when the hour of disillusion came to the child, so far as Santa Claus was concerned, the question might be suggested, "What about Jesus—is he a myth, too?" Or even the awful thought might come into the youthful mind that perhaps "God" himself is only "an old Roman Catholic myth of past ages." Think of the predicament of the Christian mother who has just told her little daughter that "there isn't any Santa Claus; he was only make-believe, you know," hearing the child a few minutes later confiding the astounding information to her younger brother, and then adding with fine indignation and disgust, "And now I don't believe that there is a God either; he was just 'make-believe,' too!" No wonder that the Spokane preacher is in a panic, when he conjures up in his fancy the possible horrors that attend upon the pricking of the Santa Claus bubble.

Lecture Notes.

My next appointment after Davenport, Ia., was New Ross, Indiana. It might be of interest to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to hear something of the struggle for Freethought in this village. Last April, also, it was my privilege to give a lecture here. The town was savagely orthodox. But two weeks before Remsburg gave the first Liberal lectures ever heard in this place. The people are Methodists and Disciples, and the Copernican system of astronomy was no greater surprise to the people of three centuries ago than were the principles of Freethought to the bigots of New Ross. The Bruch brothers, John, Philip, and Michael, together with Messrs. W. H. Gott and J. K. Henry, were the only Liberals who dared avow their principles. The Christians declared that those Infidel lectures must stop. They packed our meetings with a Christian mob, and had a preacher by the name of Weatherford present to challenge me to a debate. They actually thought that the Infidels would retreat at the first opposition. Poor deluded victims of priestcraft! Little did they think that the champions of their religion are on the run all over the world. Amid the shouts of the audience, the challenge was made. The sky-pilot declared that the debate must be held in the church. He would agree to no rules, except that I was not to use the Bible nor refer to ancient or modern history, to prove anything. He is reported to have said that twenty-five preachers would be on hand to help him. Of course we could not agree to such terms. It was all meant for a bluff. When I went away a great meeting was held in the church to celebrate the funeral of Infidelity. All were sure that we would have no more lectures. But they were disappointed. Mr. Philip Bruch determined to secretly undermine the churches. Of the generous missionary scheme of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER good use was made. Fully fifty copies of the "Age of Reason" were circulated. The young men of the town began to read it. It was not long before a change of sentiment was apparent. Those who were so arrogant and boastful became very meek. Some of the Christians realized the fact that in their attempt to crush us out, they were wanting in nothing but the auricular appendages to make genuine donkeys of themselves. One man who had said that his savior had died for him, and that if necessary he would die for his savior, was silent. Christians as a rule became respectful, or said nothing. Last November they were surprised by the appearance of Remsburg again. They still thought that I would not come back. I did, however, and gave three lectures. There was no opposition. The audience was good, attentive, and respectful. The preachers who were so brave last spring now devote their time to trying to induce the people to stay away.

Liberals are very foolish when they permit Christians to tyrannize over them. A half-dozen well informed Freethinkers in a community can hold the churches at bay. When they find that we are in earnest, they are glad to let us alone. The "Age of Reason," as a missionary among the heathen, can not be too highly extolled. It is bound to make an impression on every man of brains who reads its pages. We cannot better advance our grand cause than by circulating it by the ten thousand.

FRANKLIN STEINER.

Oregon Liberals, Attention.

To the Secularists of Oregon: Your legislature is in session. The Oregon State Secular Union is doing its best to have church property taxed. You can help. Write to the member from your county to work and vote to tax church property. No matter whether you know him or not, or whether you belong to the same party or not. When he is elected he belongs to the people. Request or demand what you want if you ever hope to get it. You want church property taxed; then say so, and say it to your representative and senator at Salem. Say so now, and help out the committee now there working for that end. Do not delay. It is only a few minutes' work to write a letter or two, and only the expense of a few stamps. As a rule, your members will be glad to hear from you. Anyway, do not give them a chance to say, when they come home, "I am so sorry you did not write to me about it." Suppose we do fail. If we never try, of course we will fail. Agitation is education. When we can make a showing of numbers the average legislator will respect our wishes; if we do not, he will not. Sometimes, in war, a noisy regiment is mistaken for an army. Let the letters pour in upon the members at Salem by the hundreds, right away. Don't send petitions, send letters; and every man and woman write for himself or herself.

Sunday Closing.

An article with this title in the New York Evening Post says that laws which try to close "the saloons to the working man on the only idle day he has in the week" "have simply thrown him into the arms of Tammany, as a power which will permit the law to remain a dead letter," and also that "a Sunday law converts every liquor-dealer into an enemy of the law and a debaucher of the police." I should be glad to see the saloons closed on Sunday, but the best way to do it is to provide plenty of innocent amusement elsewhere. Philanthropists can do something for the working man's recreation, but what would do him the most good is liberty to find amusement for himself wherever he can do so without injuring himself or his neighbors. This teaches him enterprise and self-reliance. Let him by all means have a chance to dance, see plays, and hear music on Sunday, but let us have the theaters, concert halls, and beer gardens kept pure enough for his daughter and sister to be able to accompany him and enjoy themselves without a blush. There is no surer way to loosen the hold of the churches on the wives and daughters of the poor.

The Post says, too, of the working man, that "the one place where he can talk or discuss with his fellowmen, and under conditions of comfort, is the saloon." Better places ought to be open to him on Sunday; and they could be found in the little shops which sell candy, newspapers, cigars, groceries, and other articles of food to working people, but do not sell liquor. If the law were to permit such safe and convenient places to be open to visitors at all hours on Sunday, there would be much less need of legislation in favor of temperance.

The Bible in the Schools.

John C. Pelton, known as the founder of the public schools in San Francisco, was present at the meeting of the Presbyterian Ministerial Union in that city on December 24th, and read a paper on "Religious Instruction in Public Schools." From a synopsis thereof in the Call we quote:

To bring the schools up to the position which they should occupy as agencies for moral training he believes a return should be made to religious teaching through the precepts of the Bible. He does not advocate a general and indiscriminate use of it, but would have a copy of it lying upon every teacher's desk and would have judicious selections from it read daily, along with such other devotional exercises as no reasonable person could object to, and which should be satisfactory to every Christian and patriot alike.

And why not satisfactory as well to every Jew and patriot alike?

And why not also satisfactory to every Infidel and patriot alike?

Are the Christians of this country the only patriots? Are the public schools to be run as an adjunct to their sectarian prejudices, no matter how much they may offend the worshipers at other shrines?

The subject of Pedagog Pelton's paper was pretty thoroughly discussed by those present, and the Call's report says:

The discussion showed quite a general agreement with the views expressed in the paper, though there was an evident divergence on some points, among others as to the proper use to be made of the Bible, some believing that it should be used as a text-book entire instead of having garbled extracts taken from it in accordance with the judgment or fancy of whoever may happen to be given the task to perform.

Well, well, well! What next? Not content with wanting to thrust the Bible down the throats of the school children, these ministers would have it used as a text-book; would, in fact, convert the common schools into auxiliaries to the churches and make of them subsidiary Sunday-schools. And what Christianity would they teach—the Christianity of Calvin, of Luther, or of Wesley? That would depend, doubtless, on how many School Directors each sect might be able to capture.

Is it not well to pause now and consider whither we are drifting? Is it not a question whether those who are charged with abusing the public schools, could be—even if the charge were true—any worse enemies thereto than are those who are trying to use them for their own sectarian purposes? Is it not high time for the people to declare that all religions alike must keep their hands off the public schools?

The Bee thinks it is. The first step toward that end is obedience to the laws of this state. If those laws are respected and enforced, there will be no Bible reading in the public schools.

The inevitable trend of Bible reading in the common schools, as shown in the above extracts, is respectfully dedicated to the Board of Education of the city of Sacramento.—Sacramento Bee.

The men of Northampton are proud of Bradlaugh. They have more right to be proud of him than other men have, for they stood by him when all men were against him. His statue, unveiled yesterday, is an honor alike to the town and to the dead tribune. "Thorough" is inscribed on the pedestal, and there could be no better epitome of Bradlaugh than that famous bit of Saxon. The paralytic radicalism of the day stands in need of men like Bradlaugh, and of his method of "Thorough." He had his defects of vision and sympathy; he was cast in an antiquated mold; but his slogging vigor of attack and defense excites in us in 1894 a sense of despairing envy.—London Star.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We have given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We have also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS have been scattered broadcast over the land.

And now, during the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people have time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we have prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensive; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to give and to have given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to have one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and have it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who have the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

"Liberty for Man, Woman and Child," and the Tribute to Ebon C. Ingersoll.

So many have wanted the lecture on Liberty, and also the tribute to Colonel Ingersoll's brother, that Mr. Farrell has had them printed in one pamphlet, uniform with the other lectures and at the same price—25 cents. And he has added as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it.

This lecture on liberty for the women and children has made many converts to rationalism among the fairer portion of humanity, and it is the best one to give to the good women who have a prejudice—fostered by the ministers—against the Colonel because he has "taken away their savior." When they read this they usually revise their opinion of the apostle of liberty, and read his other works—which they wouldn't look at before. If you know a good Christian girl, any age, just give her a copy of this lecture. Postpaid, 25 cents.

Observations.

I hear from Robert Wade of Troy, N. Y., and also from the newspapers that a revivalist named Sunday has attacked that outpost of Satan. Mr. Sunday was formerly a member of the Chicago baseball team and tells his hearers that there was a time when "a man would not trust him even to hold a yellow dog." On the strength of this record, which would disqualify him as player in any respectable ball team, Mr. Sunday feels prepared to enter the ministry and effulge as a shining light. The Lord often shows weak discriminating powers in selecting his servants. Any person of good judgment, having to choose between Mr. Sunday and the yellow dog that could not be trusted with him, would have whistled to the dog instead of calling the man.

The papers report that a gentleman of the name of Murphy, son of Francis Murphy, the temperance advocate, joined the political parsons who held a meeting in this city last Sunday for the purpose of instructing Mayor Strong in his official duties. Mr. Murphy was as ardent as any of them in demanding that the Sunday excise law should be enforced. While I was in the Northwest I made the acquaintance of a gentleman of the name of Murphy, son of Francis Murphy, the temperance advocate. He was at that time engineering a blue-ribbon boom with a gospel attachment, and denounced the prohibitionists who depended upon law on the statute books instead of Christ in men's hearts as the way of salvation from the liquor habit. I had some edifying speech with Mr. Murphy, and we were in substantial agreement on the subject of prohibition, though he held to Christ and I to Keeler as the great liberator from the power of the demon rum. It was merely a difference of opinion as to the relative merits of mind cure and medicine cure. But his opposition to the prohibitory method he based on this argument, which he frequently advanced, namely: If the law could save men, Moses was sufficient; there was no need of Christ and he was a useless sacrifice. He went on to say that if Christ could save men from so powerful an adversary as Satan, he certainly must be able to save them from the lesser fiend, whisky; and, he added, you might as well pass a law that all men should be saved as that all should be sober. To me this was cultus wawa, as preaching is called in the vernacular of that country, but no Christian prohibitionist can answer it. I would like to know if the present Murphy is that Murphy, and if he has lost faith in the gospel as a jag-cure, and gone over to Keeler and the politicians.

The success that I have achieved with the aid of Col. William Henry Burr and his copy of the Peshito, in throwing the bright light of lucidity upon some obscure passages of scripture, has led Mr. C. Severance, of Ler Sangerius, Cal., to request a drink from this fountain of wisdom. To be a light and fountain in the same sentence is something, I fancy, but seldom accomplished; but as a Western editor observed when discussing Hawaiian affairs in an unbiased way, the apple of discord has sprung up in our midst and must be nipped in the bud ere it starts a conflagration that will deluge the world. As a prologue, Mr. Severance pays me some very handsome compliments—which, as I am in a position to know, are not undeserved—and then introduces the subject of Moses lifting up a serpent in the wilderness. How, inquires Mr. S., did Moses lift up the said serpent? Anticipating my reply, he "presumes, in the absence of definite information to the contrary, that it was after the usual manner of lifting reptiles—by the tail." But, he adds, we are met at once by the language of another part of the word of God which provides: "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the son of man be lifted up" (John iii, 14). Now, doth this imply that the son of man is to be raised as happened to Enoch (see O. T. Stories, Illus., p. 24, by W. Heston, D.D., LL.D., P.D.Q.) or are we warranted in concluding that at the time of the quoted excerpt going to press, the son of man still retained that terminal appendage denominated a tail? Mr. Severance puts his final query as follows: "Which way will the son of man be lifted, and when will the predicted event take place?"

I have seen snakes lifted by a noose around their gills, and am informed that an occasional erring son of man gets jerked off his base in the same way. The tenses of the Hebrew language are allowed to be so vague that when a man was writing in that tongue he could not tell, sometimes, whether he was talking about what was expected to occur next week or was rehearsing ancient history. That is why the prophecies, as certain statements attributed to Isaiah are called, have two applications—one as a record, the other as a prospectus. Thus the passage rendered "a maiden shall bear a son" is also construed by translators "a maiden hath borne a son." The difference is intense, but the tense is indifferent. The words recorded by John, "so must the son of man be lifted up," may, for all I know to the contrary, refer to the hanging of Haman, who is said to have been lifted up to a considerable altitude; or they may mean that the Brooklyn strikers will get a raise the first of next month. Let us leave the matter to the Peshito and Colonel Burr, and proceed to a consideration of the Golden Text, "And having spoken, he pursued himself around the block, to the house of Matthew the publican. And he came in at the side door thereof: for it was the Sabbath" (Mark 7, cum 11).

The scope of the legislator continues to widen with the process of the suns. On January 19, at Austin, the capital of Texas, a bill was introduced in the House by Representative Seabury providing that any person who receives a letter and fails to answer it within ten days shall be subject to a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment in the county jail for one year; and in aggravated cases both penalties shall be enforced. That looks like the initial step toward important legislation; for if the people, whose servant Representative Seabury is, can be forced to correspond whether they want to or not, why should he hesitate to put the same constraint on the deity, whose servant, doubtless, he likewise professes himself to be, and make prayer-answering compulsory? A citizen might evade the penalty by saying, in the first place, that he never got the letter; secondly, that he left it in the pocket of his other clothes, and, thirdly, that he answered it the day it was received; but no such dodge would be available to the All-hearing One. The courts would have him dead to rights, and his only way out would be the one indicated by the New York Independent, an orthodox paper, which solemnly avers that all prayers are answered—those that a weak faith might think were unattended to being answered in the negative. With a thousand-dollar fine or a year in the county jail, or both, for a leverage, I imagine that Representative Seabury would have the nerve to take a rise out of the Great Giascutis.

I like to report the progress that our Spiritualist allies are making in the way of duplicating ancient miracles. The following is from Milwaukee, Wis.: Mrs. Isa Wilson Kaynor, a medium, "handled with impunity" and without tongs "a very hot cylinder direct from over a kerosene lamp; also passing paper bank bills, silk and lace handkerchiefs through the flame without burning them, although one of the committee chosen therefor by the audience was well blistered for daring to handle the same glass cylinder." It was inconsiderate on the part of the audience to choose a committee for the purpose of being well blistered, but so reads the account in the Progressive Thinker, whence my information is elicited.

The original of this miracle is an old acquaintance of my readers who have noted in the book of Daniel the account of the three office-holders of the province of Babylon, who, like the Socialist members of the German parliament, declined to "fall down" when they heard the "cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of musick." These men, "in their coats, their hosen, and their hats, and their other garments," were remanded to a fiery furnace, where they strolled about with impunity and an angel, until his nobles the king called them out and promoted them to still better paid offices of public distrust. The sapient monarch saw the advantage to his administration of having provincial officers that the local papers would not endeavor to roast. The higher critics have set this story down for a fragment of oriental imagery, while critics who don't get high just disbelieve it, and let it go at that. Still, if Mrs. Kaynor is insusceptible of cremation, Meshach, Shadrach, and Abed-nego might have been similarly gifted. If paper in her hands refuses to ignite, if silk and lace under her touch become unflammable, and if she has money to burn and can't set it afire, why should not the hats, coats, and especially the hosen of those Hebrew gentlemen have survived the heated term? I pause for a withering reply. It is not rightly comprehensible to the unbeliever why people whose bump of marvelousness bulges with these profane miracles should reject the sacred ones; and it is simply imbecil for the mongers of sacred miracles to throw away those of to-day, when they might subpoena the performers as expert witnesses.

One of the Steinway sons, of piano celebrity, has called upon the other Steinway sons for an accounting, and the books of the company, which are brought into court, furnish some suggestive items. The Charity and Donation account contains more than ordinarily stimulating grub for thought. The Steinways have been very charitable people, responding to nearly every call for a contribution. The Johnstown flood sufferers got $250; the yellow fever sufferers got $250; several churches got $25 or $50 each; there is an entry of "jury payment for Steinway, $50," suggesting that the firm knew how to conduct a case in court; the police received sums as "gratification" ranging from $2 upward; and to further show how deeply this wealthy corporation loves its fellow-men, the books divulge the payment of $50 for the expenses of a "meeting against free silver."

I understand that the Steinways are reckoned as honest people. Years ago a miser named Payne deposited with the elder Steinway, for safe keeping, a package of valuables. No receipt was given. The package remained in the company's safe with its seal unbroken until Payne died. The heirs had no knowledge of its existence until old man Steinway delivered it to Payne's executors. It contained bonds and bank-notes to the value of $400,000. This shows that the integrity which may be safely trusted with uncounted money is not incompatible with the business enterprise which "gratifies" the police with coin, keeps a financial account with a jury sworn to decide cases in accordance with evidence, and endeavors by the payment of cash to contribute toward the settlement of questions that should be left to the intelligence of the people. The members of the Steinway company may be sincere in their piety—their gifts to the churches testify to that; and they may honestly think that free silver is dangerous; but it strikes me that police "gratification" and $50 "jury payment" throw a shadow upon their philanthropy and tend to discredit their motives. The church, the police, "approachable" jurors, and the gold-bugs, are a mongrel lot to be feeding together on crumbs from the rich man's table.

Our great and good friend the president has offered Congress a scheme for repairing the treasury remnant. It is the issue of a half billion dollars' worth of 3 per cent bonds, payable in gold fifty years hence. Treasury notes are receivable for said bonds, and said notes shall be canceled and withdrawn from circulation. Banks purchasing the bonds may issue notes to par value of the bonds. The scheme would turn a half billion of assets into an interest-bearing debt of equal amount. The interest would be fifteen million dollars a year, or seven hundred and fifty millions in fifty years. Can a worse policy be recommended? If not, the debate is closed and Congress will proceed to enact the measure. Meanwhile, let the middle-aged rejoice that they will be dead, though damned, when the debt falls due.

Patience and much strength of purpose are required to read the last encyclical of the pope, for his holiness is discursive and does not wield a very facile pen. He is less amusing than George Francis Train and not so instructive as Editor Moore of the Blue Grass Blade. I would advise him to drop his distinguishing whine and jerk a little unctious into his ink. He is nothing that he pretends to be, and he knows it; and he is fatally deficient in his perceptive powers if he does not know that every intelligent person is likewise cognizant of that fact. Why does he take himself seriously?

The encyclical is addressed, in the canting style to which popes are addicted, to "our venerable brethren, the archbishops and bishops," and touches in an admonitory way upon several topics of contemporaneous human interest—as union of church and state, the labor question, and divorce.

On the condition of Catholic politics in this part of the moral vineyard the pope, whose name, I believe, is Joachim Pecci, though he makes his mark "Leo P. P. XIII.," discourses after the following fashion:

That your republic is progressing and developing by giant strides is patent to all; and this holds good in religious matters also. For even as your cities, in the course of one century, have made marvelous increase in wealth and power, so do we behold the church, from scant and slender beginnings, grown with rapidity to be great and exceedingly flourishing.

You are right as a trivet, Mr. Pecci, though you don't stand on three legs. The Catholic church is strictly in it. I don't suppose that Christ would be able to recognize the fat old damsel as his relict.

He goes on felicitating the reverend brethren:

The church among you, unopposed by the Constitution and government of your nation, fettered by no hostile legislation, protected against violence by the common laws and the impartiality of the tribunals, is free to live and act without hindrance.

True. No church with any political influence is discriminated against in this country, and as the church of the pope does not lack that advantage, no one who likes to stand by to see fair play would expect what follows his acknowledgment of a square deal by the honest farmers of this agricultural community. If religion would exercise that liberality which it admires when itself is the object of it—if Freethought could be said to be "fettered by no hostile legislation," "protected by the impartiality of tribunals," and "free to live and act without hindrance"—Freethinkers could lie abed later and Vigilance could take her hair out of curl-papers. But religion never stops asking for anything it can possibly get, and so we find the pope saying to the venerable brethren:

It would be very erroneous to draw the conclusion that in America is to be sought the type of the most desirable status of the church, or that it would be universally lawful or expedient for state and church to be, as in America, dissevered and divorced.

That is to say, liberty is insufficient, and equality and impartiality are unsatisfactory. Even exemption from taxation, millions in state appropriations to church institutions, and a strong political pull, fail to appease the papal appetite. Indeed, they are not so much as acknowledged by his holiness with thanks; and our state and national governments get no credit for the nice, commodious jails and penitentiaries they provide for the higher education of Catholic protectory and parochial school graduates. These do not count. The desire of the pope's heart, and what he instructs the venerable brethren to scheme for, is that the church, "IN ADDITION TO LIBERTY," shall enjoy "THE FAVOR OF THE LAWS AND THE PATRONAGE OF THE PUBLIC AUTHORITY." The English of which, in lower-case type, is that the Vatican wants Roman Catholicism established as the official religion of the United States.

The pope himself is a rather insignificant little old man, with diabetes and atrophied functions, but his voice is the voice of the college of cardinals, who are robust and mean business; so that if the archbishops and bishops of America take the necessary steps to carry out the recommendations of the encyclical, then a long program of interesting proceedings will shortly be presented to the American public. The utterance of the encyclical on the subject of divorce is what might be expected. Catholicism fosters that paralytic—I might almost say legless—species of morality which must use the church and state as a pair of crutches. Divorce is therefore denied to the cripples. Concerning the labor question the pope advises strikers "not to touch what belongs to another," which advice comes with extraordinary grace from a college of ecclesiastical banditti plotting to steal a continent.

News and Notes.

The campaign at Prescott has closed with every indication of future advance. The Opera House last evening, January 27th, was crowded to listen to the concluding lecture on "Evolution and Creation." To-morrow, Tuesday evening, will be a grand Paine celebration, the first, I guess, ever held in the territory, but not by any means the last. Great interest has been awakened in the community, and it needs but vigorous measures to push Freethought to the front. The elements are here. The national and local organizations can now count over one hundred members, and I feel sure that those here on the ground will not let the present golden opportunity pass by. Hard work and persistent courage will be necessary. The Christians are bringing all their modern tactics into play; boycott, social ostracism, and other exasperating methods of civilized savagery in which the followers of Jesus are expert and which oftentimes prove so effectual when backbone is lacking, and the mol-lusk prevails.

The great storm is ended; the greatest "in the history of mankind," it is said by the veracious editors, that ever swept over Arizona. The oldest inhabitants don't remember anything quite equal to it. It prevented my seeing the cliff-dwellings and looking into the ancient wonders of Arizona, as I expected, so I must adjourn this pleasure for golden days to come, as also my visit to the canon of the Colorado. I cannot therefore write up the curiosities of Arizona. I am sure that I could have made my communications to THE TRUTH SEEKER quite interesting with the record of these underground adventures and travels in the bowels of the earth. We have to creep and crawl through all sorts of dark and winding ways in the crumbling abodes of the cliff-dwellers; and if I could only picture that weird and fascinating journey, it would certainly be an instructive addition to the records of my secular pilgrimage. But when nature gets on one of her mad freaks, and piles cloud on cloud, and rolls wind on wind until it seems as if the whole universe was in a tempest of delirious wrath, it is no use to insist upon the rights and privileges of man, who is the denizen of her empire. We must simply submit. We can do nothing. Nature will have her own way and we must make the best of it.

However, the storm was not so severe in Prescott but what we could hold our meetings regularly, with good attendance from beginning to end. Prescott has not suffered nearly so much from the storm as other places throughout the country, and when the weather is fine here it is simply superb. It is exuberant with the splendor of shining landscapes and glittering skies.

I was desirous, above all, of visiting the ranch of Mr. J. K. Hall, who lives about fifteen miles distant from Prescott, where many good things await the Pilgrim. Mr. Hall and his family are staunch Freethinkers, and not a cloud of superstition floats over his happy fireside. However, his daughter, Sharlot M. Hall, has been present in Prescott the whole month and has attended every lecture, rain or shine. She was born into Freethought with every fibre of her being and has never had to fight any ghosts to get rid of them. They do not haunt any portion of her intellectual horizon. She is a healthful representative of the abounding life of this great Western land. She is entering upon a literary career of bright promise; is a contributor to many journals east and west on various subjects, especially the pre-historic relics of Arizona, of which she is a thorough student. She has recently won a prize in competition with some of our best writers, so we can be proud of this fearless and gifted exponent of Freethought who has such a brilliant future in the ranks of our Western authors.

It has been a great privilege to enjoy the frank hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Dr. J. Miller, and the toils of the campaign have been mingled with fireside delights. Rex Miller, their son, has no use for ghosts or gods, so far as I can see. He is left to judge for himself. There is no compulsion in this Freethought family.

Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Rodenburg are among my old-time allies. When I first came here, about eight years ago, Mr. Rodenburg was the mainstay of the enterprise, and stood by me through thick and thin. I was rather discouraged at the outlook then. We had hardly a corporal's guard to attend. But the years have rolled on and now we have crowded houses, and the flags are floating over advancing columns. Mr. Rodenburg has a delightful family where intelligence reigns and the dark shadow of orthodoxy vanishes. Freda, the youngest, who was just born when I was here last, is especially devoted to the colors of Freethought and, like a fairy, would charm the way of the Pilgrim with beautiful flowers.

Mr. W. J. Roberts is one of the old citizens of the place. He came here a long time ago, when little more than a boy, and has had varied adventures with Indians, white men of all sorts, and has seen humanity in its roughest exterior. But while he has lost faith in God he has not lost faith in man, and believes in liberty and progress, and is one of our foremost soldiers. Mrs. Roberts is somewhat inclined to the Methodist church, and rather lingers with its fond associations, but she attended all the lectures; gave me a warm welcome, and showed the spirit of Freethought even if she didn't exactly agree with all that I said.

Mr. James Brown has been here for many years, a sturdy worker. He has battled with nature and won a home, much better than any that the New Jerusalem can offer. He is a most generous supporter of our cause. What a reform we could make if we had a regiment like him.

Mr. P. A. Williams is another of our veteran corps, always ready to assist, and not afraid to be counted.

Mr. John Davis, in spite of floods, came all the way from Verde, a distance of over thirty miles, to attend the closing lectures and the Paine celebration. He could not come before on account of the rains. He is on the frontier line. Whatever fortune may be, he is ready to do his level best for humanity. If he has a dollar it is always for somebody else's benefit as well as his own.

I could mention many others, but space forbids. I have certainly enjoyed this changing aspect of Western life. I have had plenty of agitation. Yesterday a Roman Catholic champion appeared upon our platform. He did not like some strictures that I made upon the church of Rome and its policy. He thought I was an A. P. A., a "know-nothing," etc. We gave him full opportunity to set things right. He did not, however, rebut my statements, but simply showed the good things said and done by some Catholics, all of which I cordially accepted. As he declared himself in favor of equal rights for all, I told him that our difference of opinion should not prevent our joining hands for human freedom; that, to some extent, he was drifting out of Rome into Reason; and if he kept on he would eventually be a Freethinker. I hope so. He did well for his side of the question. He showed the bright aspects of Rome. I showed the dark which no amount of rhetoric can cover up, and in which are the powers of destruction.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Prescott, Jan. 28, 295.

When to Laugh.

When an animal sees or hears something unusual, it is alarmed and seeks safety. And when, after long ages, the ape animal gradually takes on the characteristics of man, he is affected in the same manner by any strange appearance or sound. Savage man, governed only by the family head or chief, as is a herd of buffaloes, knowing nothing of natural laws, fancies a demon in the flying cloud, in the lightning, in the thunder, in the gale. He ascends, through the slow steps of evolution, to the grade of barbarian, gains some knowledge of agriculture and architecture, improves his language, and adopts a more complex government. But here he is just as ignorant of the causes of natural phenomena; and his superstitious notions, whatever they may be, through heredity, have become stronger and pervade his whole being. He acknowledges his own inability to give a reason for his beliefs; but he credulously accepts the hit-or-miss dictum of the chief or some one bold enough to act the rôle of teacher. The teacher becomes a priest; and his dreams and visions, superinduced by efforts of the imagination to discover things unknown, are assumed to be revelations from demons or gods.

When man has risen to what we call a state of civilization, he has advanced still more in agriculture, commerce, political economy, art of war, etc., and has a stronger and perhaps more oppressive government. But in respect to knowledge of nature's laws, the majority of persons in the so-called civilized states are but in line with the barbarian. They also are believers in spirits of the air that visit them in dreams. They likewise are unable to give reasons of their own for the theological faith that is in them, and as credulously believe that the mystical ordination of a priest enables him to interpret mysteries by making them more mysterious. When they sing "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform," they publish the fact that they make little use of science.

Notwithstanding his presence is obnoxious in an enlightened community, it may be admitted that the priest is of service among barbarians—that he is a necessary evil. It is held by some philosophers that a priesthood is a natural factor in the process of evolution; that the office of priest operates as a spur to investigate, to improve, to guide; that by its influence the cruel passions of the king and the license of the people are each restrained. But in spite of his virtues, being the sole reservoir of what little knowledge there is, the priest becomes arrogant and exacting, and the people stagnate. War, subjugation, even slavery, may also be elements in the process of evolution. At any rate, war is about the only means of lifting or forcing a people out of such stagnation in ignorance and superstition; for, being brought into contact with different customs and opinions, their own will be gradually modified.

But the priest seems to be indigenous to all soils. Evolution has not yet reached time nor place for his extinction. He may be knocked out in some locality to-day; to-morrow, with a little expedient modification, he is in alliance with the conqueror. He is in alliance with our own governments—federal and state. Though constrained at the time of the Revolution to take a back seat, he has since then worked his way to the front. He is in every public body, drawing salaries for telling an old story, and needs not serve the country in any other capacity. He enjoys the fat of the land, while his millions of property is exempted from taxation. And in spite of all this some folks think we are not priestridden.

The priest is a product of barbarism; and so far as we support him and fear his dogmas we are barbarians. The barbarian religion of gods and devils, and their alleged antics among men and women, is not suited to cultured, reasoning minds.

In a few spots only of the world has man risen to a degree of knowledge and freedom where he can stop and laugh at the priest. Ridicule may be an agent in the economy of evolution for his dethronement; the wit of many Voltaires may multiply and enlarge such happier spots. But where the priest has the power and the will to persecute and torture for heresy, not much laughing is done. When feeling the thumbscrew, one does not feel like smiling. When stretched on the rack, or while having the tongue torn out with red-hot tongs, it is difficult to laugh. Many good people still suffer from fear of his hellish dogmas; who enter the sanctuary court like so many criminals to be prayed for and fined. But as his fangs are broken, and his sacred instruments for saving souls are seen only in museums, we claim and enjoy the right to laugh the laugh of ridicule.

After one has attended an orthodox church for twenty years it is high time to begin to laugh.

When, of all the many gods that have figured on, under, and above the earth, our priest claims to be in partnership with the only one whose word is worth a cent; who can, when he gets ready, flog all the other gods at once; who alone directs the lightning bolt when it strikes his own altar—we smile the smile of ridicule.

When his notions of monogamy and the origin of life are derived solely from the Bible genesis, and he gravely repeats the Arab fable, a contemptuous smile is generated.

He describes his god as having been confined with a band of outlaws in a desert wilderness and a barren mountain for forty years; and we laugh.

He then pictures him as the instigator of murderous and thievish raids on the heathen round about—on "a people living in peace and plenty;" and we smile with disgust.

When he attempts—though he seldom does now-a-days—to extract divine lessons from the story of Dinah, from the Songs of Solomon and other love stories, we think of Comstock and laugh.

He makes his God, in an unusual but not an original method, to become a father; hence the Trinity family. And we laugh the laugh of derision.

He falsifies history; tells of many terrible persecutions suffered by the early Christians from Pagans; when we know that most of the persecutions were between themselves on charges of heresy. And we laugh.

He brazenly asserts that the church never tortured for heresy—that the civil power alone did so—when the awful instruments of torture were taken from her altars. And we laugh at his lies.

He claims that all the liberty and civilization we possess are due to Christianity; when the fact is the Dark Ages were due to that religion, and that liberty and progress are now increasing in exact proportion to the increase of Infidelity. And we laugh at his assurance.

On an anniversary meeting of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the priest appears on the platform and claims for his religion all the honor of mercy, in face of the fact that the Society was founded by an unbeliever. And we laugh at his false claims.

When his sacred chapel has just been struck by lightning, and he dodges a little talk on special providence, we laugh the laugh of triumph.

Ridicule and laughter are proper means to take To cure the sick belief in a fire-and-brimstone lake. The Hestonian pencil sketches truth every time, And shows priestcraft to be something else than divine.

L. G. REED.

Wise Vs. Vennum.

It matters little if we credit Wise;
His cloth's enough to tell us Vennum lies.
These verses remind me while I pen 'em
The wise have everywhere encountered venom,
The priest, since Socrates first drank the bowl,
Has, for the wise, kept venom in his soul,
But when the venom he some new way tries,
To think what it may light on would be wise.
The wise have often call'd "God's Book" obscene.
But Vennum, surely, ought to find it clean.
Venom, not fit for Mrs. V. to read,
To call God's word, is scarcely wise, indeed.
Oh Vennum, there is greenness in thine eyes,
Infallible disproof of being wise.
Oh Wise! not Vennum you could surely think
Would wish, like Jesus, his own self to drink;
It was for you he brewed himself; so, Wise,
Swallow your Vennum in his usual guise,
In drinking venom, you put Vennum down;
Be wise enough to prize the martyr's crown,
Which Vennum, being venomous, can give
But, if not wise, to wear will never live.
O Wise! Oh Venom! Ancient heirs of fame!
Oh venom-drinking wise! Oh venomous shame!
How soon the sacred gown, by venom worn,
Turns to the pennant sheet defiled and torn;
How soon the felon's stripes, which venom places
Upon the wise, adorn celestial spaces!
Since venom made our earliest parents wise
Venom in vain to outrun wisdom tries;
But the wise, getting venom for his pains,
The venom's loss makes his own deathless gains.

Paine's Memory Honored at Louisville.

There was a Paine celebration at Louisville, Ky., on Jan. 27 in commemoration of the 158th anniversary of his birth. It was called a "Sacred Concert," presumably to avoid an encounter with Kentucky's enlightened Sunday law. Turngemeinde Hall was well filled, the occasion was in every way an enjoyable one, and the addresses were calculated to open the eyes of such orthodox people as heard them or read the reports of the meeting as given in the local papers. This was the program:

1. Violin and Piano, Duet.....Louis and Phil. Hollenbach
2. Chorus.....Harmonia
3. Vortrag ueber Thomas Paine.....Carl Neumeyer
4. Gedicht.....Phil. Adams
5. Lecture.....Dr. Carter
6. Duet.....Louis and Phil. Hollenbach
7. Recitation.....Miss Carter
8. Harmonia.....
9. Trompeter von Sackingen—Solo.....Jos. Simon

Dancing after the entertainment.

Mr. Neumeyer's address was in German and dealt only with the political services of the Hero of Three Countries. Dr. Carter spoke in unqualified praise of both his political and religious writings. One of the most interesting parts of the program was a recitation by Miss Lois Bligh Carter, who is but fifteen, but has recited at Mr. Remsburg's lectures in Louisville, and on this last occasion won the unstinted praise of the Courier-Journal.

The legislative season is here. Congress is already at work, and many of the state legislatures are also in session. Soon all will be, and this is the opportunity for the political Christians. During the next six months these meddlers will be more active than ever before. We want each of our readers to constitute him- or herself a committee of one to keep watch of the enemies of the secular state. Report to us immediately every movement of the theocrats. Look out for new Sunday laws and attempts to more rigorously enforce old ones; watch for appropriations to the church and to institutions under the control of the church; gather all the facts that you can in relation to the exemption of church property from taxation; be vigilant in regard to religious teaching in the schools; note what is said and done about the employment and payment of chaplains; do not fail to keep informed and to inform us as to the attacks which the anti-naturalists are sure to make on the agencies of expression and transmission. Do not assume that the Editor will find out all about these things through the daily papers; there are hundreds of those journals, and there are only seven days in the week; something of vital importance to our cause may escape his eye and yours may catch it in the nick of time; it will be better for him to have his attention called to it repeatedly than not to see it at all. So send along the items. In this connection we will request all the members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps and all others who will now engage to write one letter each week to the target selected by the Captain to send us their names and addresses, not for publication, but that we may know how many there are, and so be better enabled to direct their activities. Let us make the coming year memorable in the annals of Secularism.

MRS. M. P. KREKEL'S lecture dates:

Feb. 3d.....Alliance, O. Feb. 24th.....Brooklyn, N. Y.
Feb. 10th, Philadelphia, Pa. Feb. 24th.....Newark, N. J.
Feb. 22d.....New York City.

The 17th and a few week evenings are still vacant in February. Those wanting lectures near the Sunday lecture times and places should write at once. March, the whole month (Sundays) she is in Cincinnati, and parties living near that city in Ohio, Kentucky, and West Virginia, who would like to secure week evening engagements should apply at once. Permanent address 802 East 11th street, Kansas City, Kan.

The list of Mr. Remsburg's appointments in Texas, on page 86, should be corrected as follows: Clifton, February 19th, 20th; Dublin, 21st, 22d; Stephenville, 23d; Ft. Worth, 24th; Gainesville, 25th.

WHITE HALL, WIS., Jan. 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I want to do a little missionary work for the cause of Free-thought. Inclosed is $1, for which send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason."

I am a resident in the principal hotel here, and have good opportunity to meet many people from all parts of the country; have disposed of five copies within the last few months. Paine's works are the best I know of to get people to investigate and seek the truth. When they have once read Paine's works they are ready to take up some other works and investigate further.

COCOANUT GROVE, FLA., Jan. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me two copies of your ANNUAL. I think it must be good. If I had been asked to select the writers, the very first I should have named are the eight you have on your list, viz: R. G. Ingersoll, S. P. Putnam, Matilda Joselyn Gage, Helen H. Gardener, Susan H. Wigon, Katie Kehm Smith, John Peck (when he writes on Free-thought), and last but not least George E. Macdonald. I sincerely regret the inexorable law that prevented me from writing every name first, for each deserves first place. I must not close without expressing my admiration and earnest appreciation of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its brave, effective work.

NEW ROSS, IND., Jan. 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: On the 18th, 19th, and 20th of January, Franklin Steiner delivered a series of lectures here. Despite the inclemency of the weather he had very attentive and appreciative audiences.

His actions are filled with grace; his speech is vigorous and effective. His arguments are strong; his reasoning clear and logical; his humor keen, pleasant, and appropriate.

Of his lectures, "Morality without Superstition" is one among the best. It was permeated throughout with humorous infusions, which provoked laughter; it sparkled with truth; was supported by vastness of resource and the soundest of reasoning, with no bias but the aim for truth.

The community is aroused; the lectures have had the desired effects; they have provoked comment, promoted thought, and exacted the conclusion that Liberalism is growing.

LIBERAL THINKER

To Bury the Hatchet.

KENT, O., Jan. 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in your issue of Jan. 19th that a partisan Texan takes THE TRUTH SEEKER to task for publishing a card from me in which I, commenting on the results of the election of last November, said, "Even the Memphis Appeal concedes that there is nothing left to the Democracy but heaven and Mississippi, and it might have added hell and Texas, or perfidy and dishonor." The above sentence seems to have greatly disturbed him. He thinks he sees sectional hate and fanaticism lurking in it. Not understanding it he asks, "What does the poor man mean by the expression, 'Hell and Texas or perfidy and dishonor?'"

Lest your correspondent from Clinton, Texas, should nurse his wrath till it develops into sectional hate, allow me to explain what was meant in the above quotations. "Hell," is left to the democracy in the execration of the people for its betrayal of their confidence. Texas is left, for it almost alone by its popular vote approved of the record of the recreant Democratic party. If he wishes to know what is meant by the words "perfidy and dishonor" let him read Cleveland's letter to Representative William Wilson, where his chief uses said words and from which they were quoted.

In conclusion allow me to say to Bro. S. M. Etheridge: Let us bury the hatchet of political intolerance along with that of religious intolerance; then our political sores will be cured. Let us devote all our energies to fighting our common enemy, ecclesiastical domination, lest it shall reduce us to mental serfdom. Knowing no sectionalism, I am, Yours, M. H. HEIGHTON.

One Man Among Twenty-five Thousand Christians.

OSWEGO, N. Y., Jan. 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed my dues as a member of your school. You, with your excellent assistant, Watson Heston, give your readers a paper excelled by none in liberating the beclouded mind from bondage. Please tell me if any of Mr. Ingersoll's family are members of Christian churches; if so, what church?

My "Four Hundred Years of Free-thought" is a volume of rich treasures, deserving of all the praise it is receiving.

Only for my large amount of Liberal literature I should be as isolated as Robert Selkirk. I am the only outspoken Agnostic in a city of 25,000 inhabitants, enjoying all the privileges and patronage given to a good Christian. The reason is the public appreciates an honest, fearless, true man. I have no sympathy or respect for a coward.

They are slaves who dare not speak
The truth they needs must think;
They are slaves who dare not be
In the right with two or three.

Our actions should be a silent educator of the public. We're in the fight to the finish.

All Sing!

DUBUQUE, KAN., Jan. 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: After having my crops on six hundred acres almost entirely destroyed by drouth two years in succession, and after reading of the widespread destruction of crops throughout the Union by the same cause, I composed the following hymn, to be sung by the farmers on Thanksgiving days. Sing to the tune of "The Kansas Girl."

God holds the rain within his hand,
And lets the sun parch up the land.
We sow the seed, it cannot grow—
Praise him from whom all blessings flow.

Chorus:

Come, farmers dear, hurrah, and cheer
For him who takes away our home,
And leaves us free this world to roam.

The mortgage on the team is due,
On wagon, plow, and harness too.
"No extension" now, since crops won't grow—

Praise him from whom all blessings flow.

The farm for taxes will be sold,
And we'll be fired out in the cold;
No earthly cares then shall we know—
Praise him from whom all blessings flow.

We'll join the tramps and roam the earth
And bear glad tidings of Christ's birth
To every heathen here below—
Praise him from whom all blessings flow.

Yours truly, W. H. KERR.

From a Former Shaker.

HAMMONTON, N. J., Jan. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 to bring me the best paper I know of for one-third of another "time." I see Brother Hacker is able still to hit shams a whack now and again. I well remember how, some sixty years since, we prized the visits of his paper, the Pleasure Boat. It was radical then, but the Shakers tolerated it and the youths devoured the contents eagerly. I prize your paper because it keeps us informed of the doings of the would-be tyrants—would be if they could secure government help. The editorials, Observations, News and Notes, and John Peck's contributions are all grand, while Heston's fund seems almost inexhaustible. May all live to do immense good.

J. P. Cryder admits being a Spiritualist, and even a medium, and yet cannot say he knows nor that he hopes. I am not sure that any of us knows, as positive knowledge comes by actual experience, but to hope will harm no one. Mr. Cryder thinks "there must be there, as here, a perpetual struggle for existence," etc. I will hope the incentive to such may not exist there. Much if not all comes through the ruling of designing men and unjust laws on this side.

What the Sundayites Want.

VINELAND, N. J., Dec. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: A few years ago a company of bigots in Pennsylvania formed what they called the National Reform Association, and now they and other churches are doing the best, or rather the worst, they can to get Congress to give us more stringent Sunday laws. If there are cowards enough in Congress to grant their request—though Jesus in the first chapter of Mark abolished the Sabbath eighteen hundred years ago—we shall soon have laws requiring every family to attend church and pay a regular salary to the minister, and fine, or imprison, every one who walks or rides anywhere on Sunday except to church and back. Jesus called the Jewish Sabbath a winebag that had stretched as far as it could without bursting, and if Congress enacts the above laws it will burst at once, or be abolished forever, for the people are becoming too enlightened and intelligent to be driven into church by any laws that Congress can make.

The churches have had two days of glut-tony, called Thanksgiving and Christmas, and a week of idleness called holidays. Now let them take their aged, poor, worn-out and sick members out of the pauper-houses, and provide them with comfortable homes, especially in cities where they are crowded in with liars, thieves, drunkards, and harlots, and have no others for company, or to feed or nurse them, if any nursing is ever done there, and where church people never go to see how their poor are treated. I have never known a church to provide a comfortable home for a worn-out member, but always cart them off to a pauper-house and forsake them, and it is time for a change. With so much profession of godliness there should be a little humane action.

J. HACKER.

An Illustration that Illustrates.

FORT FAIRFIELD, ME., Jan. 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In my confabs with my neighbors on religion they ask me what I propose to give them in the place of Christianity.

Now, then, I propose, on this occasion, with your permission (and I hope you will grant it), to answer that great and oft-repeated question satisfactorily to myself at least, and in a way that ought, I think, to be satisfactory to every sensible person.

Suppose, for instance, that I have lived in a land of rattlesnakes, and should call on my friend Mr. Smith for a sociable chat, and we should see a rattlesnake come crawling along the road. Mr. Smith says to me, "See there, Mr. Gilman, see that rattlesnake! Take my gun, and go and shoot him." "Well, hand me your gun." So I take the gun and go out and shoot the snake. "Now, Mr. Smith, what shall I do with this snake?" "Oh, throw it over there into the brush out of the way, that's all you need do with it." "Now, Mr. Smith, what do you wish me to put there in the road in the place of that rattlesnake?" "Why, nothing, Mr. Gilman; of course not. It's enough to get rid of that confounded rattlesnake without putting anything in its place. And you did well, Henry, to shoot it and kill it as quickly as you did." "Oh, well, I suppose I used to shoot rebels when I was off in the war. At any rate, I did the best I could at it."

"Now, my Christian friend, it is precisely so with regard to religion. Let us get rid of that hydra-headed, malign, gigantic, all-damnable monster, Christianity; destroy it entirely; wipe it off the face of the earth! And we don't want to replace it with anything in particular." But common sense and reason will involuntarily insinuate themselves in where that was, and take its place, and before we are aware of it that will be an accomplished fact, and then the millennium will be near at hand, and we shall be living in a world of happy people."

Many other similar comparisons might be drawn, but I think that one is enough to convince any reasonable person that I am correct. I am now at work with my tongue the same as ever. I am hammering away at the old theological fossils with all my might.

Yours for truth against error; victory or death,

HENRY H. GILMAN.

A Large Number of Questions.

ESKRIDGE, KAN., Dec. 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Sometimes I think that ignorance is about the only thing that has been rewarded in this world; at least, in every age intelligence has been regarded as crime.

I was talking with a Bible believer the other day. He said it was not hard to understand Revelation—wanted to know if I had studied Revelation, to which I replied, "Yes, I will quote from the 12th chapter and explain: 'And there appeared a great wonder in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars,' etc., 'and there appeared another wonder in heaven, and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads, and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads, and his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them upon the earth.' Let us examine this story. Of course the woman was rather above the medium size. Nothing is said about her husband; perhaps she never had one. We don't know where heaven is located, consequently it is hard to tell on what planet the dragon was. He must have had a wonderful tail, millions of miles in length, hundreds of miles in diameter, to say nothing about the size of his body, which must have been almost beyond the flight of our imagination to calculate. I don't know where he kept his tail coiled. When he cast his tail among the stars to encircle a third part of them, the force of gravity would have held his tail, while another planet would have held his body, and trying to draw the other planets with his tail might have pulled his tail off, or drawn his body from the planet it was on. Did God make this dragon? if so, what for? can anyone see the design? Where are those stars that were cast to the earth? What would be the result of such a catastrophe? What became of the people, or was this earth inhabited at that time? If not, who saw the dragon?" He thought I was a blasphemer. Nothing can be more absurd than the claims that the Bible is a super-human production. Think of a God who would inspire the writing of such a book. Why doesn't he write another Bible, or did he do the best he could and quit? Why did he not write one that everybody could believe? Why does he punish a man because things are not reasonable? Could he save all men if he wanted to, and, if so, why don't he do it? What in the name of common sense does he want a Bible for anyhow? Cannot infinite wisdom get along without the Bible? Does reading the Bible make people honest, and, if so, are then all people honest who believe the Bible? Are there any honest people who disbelieve the dogma of inspiration? I am satisfied that we would be far better off to-day if the Bible had never been written. Of course those who love their enemies persecute me, and I am not an enemy; for many years I have been an unbeliever in the Christian religion. I believe in liberty now, always and everywhere. I don't like the gods about whom I have heard.

What Connecticut Liberals Are Doing.

NORWALK, CONN., Jan. 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER would like to hear from Connecticut occasionally. I have the pleasure of writing very gratifying news; in fact, you might call it glad tidings of great joy.

One year ago I thought I would take upon myself the responsibility of trying to have church property taxed. I appealed to the Free-thinkers of the state, and a few of them responded, but I finally received the names of many more and sent them blank petition sheets; and what has been the result? Every city in Connecticut has canvassers, except Waterbury, and the subject has caused much discussion and argument. Business men and property-holders are approving of it unanimously. Next month the petition is to be presented to the legislature, and we have secured two or three of the members to make a bold fight for it.

When I first came out with my blank petitions for signatures, the editor of a paper published in my city called me a genius, others a crank, and some crazy. But what's in a name? These very people, from personal knowledge, I would not trust, and furthermore they are densely ignorant. Let the exemptionists laugh and scoff, but the day is drawing near when every dollar of their church property will be taxed. It is the duty of every Liberal to work for the realization of this great reform, and now that we are on the eve of the hope of success let us deserve to win the battle by working hard for it.

My co-workers are P. B. Mackey, of Bridgeport; C. J. Watson, Mrs. J. E. Welch, C. N. Finch, New Haven; N. F. Griswold, Mrs. A. M. Curtis, Meriden; W. H. Higgs, Thomas Holester, Hartford; P. Dunham, A. P. Tanner, New London; Andrew Hoyberg, Norwich; Dr. Knox, Danbury; Geo. F. Elliot, New Britain; James R. Larmer, Jr., Norwalk, and W. N. Palmer, Willimantic. The pioneer labors of these men and women will always be an honor to their names, whether victory comes soon or late. Equal taxation is going to benefit not only the owner of a house but the one who rents, for as taxes will be lower, rents will be less. If there is any one who desires to contribute toward defraying the expense of this undertaking, it will be not only a help but a worthy act.

Every corporation, whether religious or otherwise, will abuse exemption privileges. Trinity church corporation proves this assertion; note the recent exposure of its flagrant violation of the law. Its buildings are unsafe, the drainage bad, and water on the ground floor only. And the revenue derived from this property is used to embellish its monuments dedicated to superstition and erect new ones. The people may live in filth and danger, for the glory of God and the benefit of a narrow-minded priesthood which has been a curse to the world wherever the dark shadow of its cross has fallen.

This is what the Liberals of Connecticut are doing, and I hope the Liberals of other states will follow our example, and even if they fail at first, lose not hope.

It would be well for each of us to send our representatives a copy of the pamphlet "Church Property," published by the Truth Seeker Company, and also to write a personal letter on the subject.

JAMES E. LARMER, JR.

Is Not Enamored of God.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., JAN. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I want to tell you how a free Methodist minister (who said he had once been an Infidel) explained to me the justice of Jesus being killed for the sins of all who repented and believed on him. He said, "You see it required an infinitesimal sacrifice to pay the debt, and Jesus, who was God in man, gave himself as a ransom for many to redeem them. If he had not been infinitesimal it would not have been a sufficient payment, but now it is more than enough." I asked, "Do you mean to tell me that God died when the Jews crucified Jesus?" "Why, no," said he, "Jesus was God in man, and of course God could not die." "Well, then," said I, "if Jesus the God lived and offered Jesus the man who died, where is the infinitesimal sacrifice? And furthermore, it would not require an infinitesimal sacrifice unless there had been a crime committed of immeasurable magnitude. But it is assumed that the sin was of that kind, because was not the punishment eternal? and the reward for repenting and believing is eternal happiness. (Mat. xxv, 46, 'And these shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal'). Now, while I admit that if I owe a debt I should pay just the amount owed, and no more; yet it is unreasonable to believe that I should ask God to forgive me for what Adam did and believe that Jesus was my redeemer and mediator for that offense or any other against God, or else God will cast me into the lake where the beast and false prophet are, in torment day and night for ever. If there is a God of justice, who 'made all things, and without him was not anything made' (which would imply that there were things in existence that were not made by him, because they were not made) it seems to me that all sin committed by those beings made by God and controlled by nature he had given them and laws of nature and external surroundings that he foreknew (or else his prophets knew more than he) and therefore fore-ordained (or else he had not the power to prevent) is not sin, and we are not puppets.

Now, by the reductio ad absurdum, if God is just he is unjust, because he controls all and then holds us responsible for our acts, and if he is almighty we poor little finite beings cannot do anything to injure him. And therefore it is more reasonable to believe that our first hypothesis is false and that there is no personal god such as is alleged. If God hardened the heart of Pharaoh, then Pharaoh was not responsible, and if God held Pharaoh responsible, God was unjust. If God accepted a gift of the best that Abel had, but rejected the best that Cain offered, I would rather take up with Augusta Chapman's rejected little tin god. If God chose the Jews and gave them privileges and a destiny not accorded to the rest of the human race, because he had made a covenant with Abraham, I have no use for such a god. A nice little stone god that I can put on the mantel, and will do no one an injustice, is better. If God gave Jephthah a battle and as payment had Jephthah murder his lovely daughter, I would hate him and not fear him. If he smote Uzza dead for trying to save the falling ark, he was a tyrant. If he killed seventy thousand of Israel because David had taken a census after he, or Satan, had tempted David to do so, he was as bad as David. A little wooden god will do for me as well.

They Are Alive Up There.

CROOKSTON, MINN., JAN. 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, and send me "Force and Matter" and the "Cosmian Hymn Book."

Freethought makes good progress in this locality. The Freethought League met last Saturday, elected officers, and enrolled five new members. We are away up in politics; our state senator, our auditor, our sheriff, one county commissioner, and our deputy county treasurer are all members of our League and active in the work. The officers of the League are Elias Steenerson, pres.; Ole E. Hagen, sec., and Jos Mathews, treas. In addition to this, there is another active Freethought move among the Scandinavians in this place. An ex-Methodist minister from Oregon, John L. Erickson, who has become converted to Freethought, has moved here and has organized a Scandinavian Free church. It is called the First Scandinavian Free Church of Crookston. All the members of the League belong to the church, and Mr. Erickson has joined our League. The new organization has met with gratifying success; it was organized in the latter part of November, and now has over fifty members. It has in connection with it a literary society called Menarva numbering about as many, and also a Women's Friendly Society, just organized, called Freya. The object of these societies is the pursuit of truth by scientific methods, regardless of results; to promote happiness and good will among men—in short, to live for men and not for gods. We expect to start a Sunday school soon. It is a new project and of course its success is not yet certain, but if it continues as it has begun it is sure to prosper. Mr. Erickson is an able man and well trained in such work, but it seems to me the Liberals are much harder to organize than the orthodox. I presume it is because Liberals have no hell to scare with nor heaven with which to conjure, leaving all the cohesion to be supplied by the social qualities they possess, which are not always abundant.

If you can give us some suggestions as to making our meetings interesting and attractive, and especially how to keep a Sunday-school going, I shall be thankful. Are there any text books in existence calculated to fill such a want? I should like to have a good picture of Colonel Ingersoll to hang up in our hall. If you have one you may send it to me, and I will remit by return mail.

Our state senator, P. M. Renzdal, started the Liberal ball a-rolling in the legislative department by entering a protest against appointing a chaplain for the state senate. He was not supported by a single vote, but we are not discouraged. We are in the right and shall prevail though we have to travel many a roundabout way to reach our destination. Public opinion is fast being molded into the form of Freethought.

ELIAS STEENERSON.

[Unfortunately, we have at present no work adapted to the more juvenile classes in Sunday-schools, as Katie Kehm Smith has often lamented in these columns. The Oregon Liberals have temporarily supplied the need with type-written lessons, prepared at state headquarters and sent by mail to the local societies. See Mrs. Smith's article on Sunday schools in THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895. No doubt that indefatigable worker would give our Minnesota correspondent additional information and useful hints if he should write to her, stating definitely and succinctly the points upon which they need enlightenment. Address, "Katie Kehm Smith, Oregon City, Or.," inclosing stamp for reply.

There is a very fine panel picture of Colonel Ingersoll, 18 by 24 inches, which we send prepaid for $5. It gives satisfaction to all who procure it.

In this connection it will be opportune to suggest to the wide-awake Freethinkers of Crookston and vicinity that they can do excellent work for the common cause by taking hold with a will and helping Comrade S. J. Fleckten, of Kandiyohi, in his splendidly heroic and so far single-handed fight against the Bible and religious services in the common schools. Reread the leading editorial in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 26, and then write to Mr. Fleckten or to us, and let the friends all over the country know just how much you want the schools of Minnesota freed from the clutch of priestcraft. There is an opening here for a telling campaign for the separation of religion and state education. Take hold all together.—ED. T. S.]

Mortuary—Gen. I. N. Stiles.

CHICAGO, ILL., JAN. 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: This well known lawyer and Freethinker passed away at his residence, 2824 Rosalie Court, Thursday morning. Several years ago the deceased was stricken with paralysis, to which he finally succumbed, and for the last four years he was totally blind. Falling into a comatose condition twenty-four hours before dying, he never returned to consciousness, and apparently sank away without a struggle or pain.

Gen. I. N. Stiles was born sixty-two years ago, in 1833, in Suffield, Conn. His father, Anson Stiles, was a farmer. He attended school during the winters. At the age of nineteen he moved to Lafayette, Ind., where he read law and taught singing-school at night to support himself.

He was admitted to the bar in 1854 and began practice. It was not long before he had acquired quite a reputation as a public speaker, a reputation which grew with every year until his infirmity came upon him.

He was prosecuting-attorney at Lafayette two years, and a member of the Indiana legislature in the session of 1857-8. At the outbreak of the war Mr. Stiles had a very successful practice, yet he enlisted as a private.

He was captured at Malvern Hill and was confined in Libby prison for six weeks, when he was exchanged. While in prison he contracted a disease from which he never fully recovered. His services were then rewarded with promotion to the rank of major of the Sixty-third Indiana. He afterwards became lieutenant colonel and colonel of his regiment, and was brevetted brigadier general for gallantry on the field of battle at Franklin, Tenn.

General Stiles came to Chicago at the close of the war and resumed the practice of law. He was at first alone, but in 1867 he formed a partnership with W. K. McAllister. McAllister was elected to the circuit bench.

General Stiles was elected city attorney in 1867, and was reelected two years later. At the close of his second term he entered into partnership with M. F. Tuley, the firm name being Tuley, Stiles & Lewis, and it was considered one of the strongest law firms in the city. Mr. Tuley being elected to the circuit bench, dissolved this partnership as it had the one with Judge McAllister.

Although General Stiles never held or sought public office after his two terms as city attorney, he was always a public-spirited citizen. He possessed the spirit of a reformer. General Stiles believed that no future life was to be hoped for; he always held that when a man's breath left him it was the end of him. He denied the separate existence of soul and body. He was a great friend of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, whose belief was his. He was a man of positive views, and bitterly hated hypocrisy and rascality.

For many years before he lost his eyesight, and when he was one of the prominent figures at the Chicago bar, General Stiles lived on the west side of Warren avenue, right opposite my house. He was, perhaps, the most universally popular man in the neighborhood. He was sought after by young and old alike for his ready humor, his all-inclusive kindness, and his sturdy honesty. He was one of the most genial of men in company. A remarkable trait in his character was his courage in his blindness; he made every effort to keep up not only his own spirit but those of his friends. To his musical acquaintances he would say, "Why on earth should anyone write a song entitled 'Pull Down the Blind,' as if the blind did not have trouble enough without there being a popular movement to pull them down?" His anecdotes when addressing a jury have acquired a national reputation. A jurymen begged to be excused on the plea that he had the itch. "Scratch him," said the general, and of course the jurymen got off. His appreciation of humor continued to the end.

An old client, a German, called to pay his respects, and incidentally expressed his great regret that he had lost his favorite dog. "I never comes home," said the German, "but that dog chump up and welcome me more than ever my wife; and now that dog is gone." "Perhaps he is calling on his girls," the general said. "Dat dog never come back," was the reply; "he is a gel."

General Stiles took his affliction philosophically and, for a year two, continued his practice. Some one attended him constantly. Approaching old age and increasing infirmity reduced him to a state where he was compelled to give up all work.

He was a firm Freethinker. Members of his family say that he held to the tenets of his belief to the end.

The last time I heard him defending Freethought was about six or seven years ago, or just before his affliction. It was at Thomas Paine's Anniversary at Central Music Hall. He was the speaker of the evening. The lecture he delivered could be duplicated by only one other in this world.

General Stiles thought this life here was the one to enjoy. His aim was to make everybody happy, and he practiced that to the full extent of his ability.

The funeral took place at his residence on the Saturday morning at 11 o'clock. The ceremonies were in charge of the Loyal Legion. M. M. Mangasarian, lecturer of the Chicago Society for Ethical Culture, and Chaplain Edwards of the Loyal Legion conducted the exercises. Solos were sung by Miss Eleanor Smith. No prayers were offered (that pleased me). Mr. Mangasarian referred to General Stiles's peaceful death, and said: "He is now where there is no pain." He also paid a tribute to the wife, who had ministered so nobly to her husband during the long period of his helplessness. Chaplain Edwards's address was largely biographical; he traced the general's career from boyhood, and told of his achievements and suffering as a soldier, and his record as a lawyer.

Many of the city's representative professional and business men were present. The body was taken in the afternoon to Loda, Ill., for burial, where his first wife, who died in 1877, is interred. Her funeral ceremonies were conducted by the general himself.

General Stiles took, at times, an active part in politics. He was a Democrat, but never hesitated because of his own party affiliation to denounce what was wrong. E. C. RICHMOND, Treas., F. F. of A.

Little Brown Hands.

They drive home the cows from the pasture
Up through the long shady lane,
Where the quail whistles loud in the wheatfield,
All yellow with ripening grain.
They find in the thick waving grasses,
Where the scarlet-lipped strawberry grows;
They gather the earliest snowdrops
And the first crimson buds of the rose.
They toss the hay in the meadow,
They gather the elder blooms white,
They find where the dusky grapes purple
In the soft-tinted autumn light.
They know where the apples hang ripest
And are sweeter than Italy's wines;
They know where the fruit is the thickest
On the long, thorny blackberry vines.
They gather the delicate seaweeds
And build tiny castles of sand;
They pick up the beautiful seashells—
Fairy barks that have drifted to land.
They wave from the tall, rocking treetops,
Where the oriole's hammock-nest swings,
And at night-time are folded in slumber
By a song that a fond mother sings.
Those who toil bravely are strongest;
The humble and poor become great;
And from those brown-handed children
Shall grow mighty rulers of state.
The pen of the author and statesman,
The noble and wise of our land;
The sword and the chisel and palette
Shall be held in the little brown hand.

The Inquirendo Club.

X.—CONCLUDED.

"We have called this meeting to order, only to dismiss our members at the final session," announced Florence. "Aunt Margaret must leave this winter for her Southern home, and Ernestine, I suppose, will have to return to school duties, so our pleasant little band must break ranks. But before we part tell me what you think of my venture, now?" "It was a most excellent one," they all averred, while Aunt Margaret said: "It exceeded even my wildest expectations, because I was not prepared for the general interest manifested. On the whole, I think our summer was profitably and pleasantly spent."

"And I," declared Arthur, "was at first skeptical regarding Florence's plan, but you know what Goldsmith prophesied:

"Those who came to scoff, remained to pray."

"Listen to Ernestine's poem," commanded Lillie. On the silence, her clear voice rang out:

November's winds are chill and drear
And drear its leaden hue;
Where once the bright sun warmly gleamed
In skies of deepest hue.

'Tis Nature's sad recital
Of dear dead summer's reign,
To never view her rosy fields
Or see her form again.

But the harvest moon gleams golden
O'er barren fields and glen;
Sad heart, despond not wholly,
The sun will shine again.

What tho' the rain beats ever
With black clouds bending low,
Take heart, nor lose the promise
Of gold beneath the bow.

The darkest cloud, 'tis told us,
Has brightest beams of light;
Despair not then, bend bravely
Thy pinions for fresh flight.

To strengthen will and venture
Thy fortune 'gainst the rub,
Has been the aim and purpose
Of the Inquirendo Club.

"That poem, as you will readily perceive, was written in extreme haste," apologized the young poet, "but if you are not too greatly discouraged over that attempt, I will repeat the little poem I wrote for our last meeting, which I trust will sound better:

FRIENDSHIP'S WORTH.

THE I—C—, 1, 30, '95.

When the tired heart seems lonely
With none to bless or cheer,
How sweetly gleams the precious boon
Of friendship's presence near.

O sweetly blessed friend of man,
What comfort thou canst give!
To make a dull sky lovely,
And deem it good to live.

The brightest, dearest thing on earth,
Promote its growth, ye sage,
And herald its dawn, O poets gay!
Proclaim it through the ages.

Live for its smiles, sweet beauty,
Adorn it with thy presence;
Diffuse its blessings far and wide,
For cottagers, kings and peasants.

Without thy beam, ah, what a life,
A cold and barren zone,
Bereft of love and kindred joys
So sunless, sad, and lone.

More bright than gold, more rare than gems,
The richest land ere brings,
It shines as fair on cottage
As on the dome of kings.

"I do not think that surpasses your other production," said Arthur critically, when young Ralph interrupted with, "I say, what do you think of this for an assertion: 'I esteem rather the delusion which makes me happy than the truth which presses me to the earth.'"

"I do not like it at all," said Florence, "it is too orthodox in sentiment. No one should esteem any delusion, knowing it to be such, under the pretense that it conduces to happiness. The sentiment is weak; the author feebly attempting to excuse a falsehood, simply because it overthrows some of her pet idols. Why don't those people have the same regard for the poor heathen? Don't you suppose it makes them unhappy to destroy their pet idols?"

Arthur took a philosophical view of the question. "It seems to me," he said, "that the author displays more knowledge of rhetoric than a perception of what constituted true happiness. It is impossible to preserve illusions knowing them to be such. If 'ignorance is bliss,' it is no argument against knowledge. Truth is often unkind, but after all its presence is more essential to wholesome gladness than a pretty deception."

"I think we will have to adjourn the meeting, or rather terminate the sessions of the Club," said Aunt Margaret, "as it is already past 4. And let me say, my dear young people, that your attention and quick purposes have delighted me very much. I am glad that Florence thought of such a plan, for I realize now, as never before, how well you are prepared for the future." And gently, kindly, Aunt Margaret looked into the faces of her hopeful charges for the last time that year.

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

Little Brother: "What you studyin' so hard?" Little Sister: "Synonyms." Little Brother: "What's them?" Little Sister: "All sorts o' words that mean the same thing." Little Brother: "What good is they? One word ought to be enough." Little Sister: "Huh! Wait till you get into society. Yesterday Mrs. Newcomer showed me a picture of a baby, and I said it was sweet and lovely and cunning and cute, and I don't know what all. After that she said that wasn't her baby, but somebody else's. Then she showed me a picture of her own baby. And then I had to think up a lot more nice words so she wouldn't feel fended. If I hadn't studied synonyms, I'd 'a' jus' died.—Good News.

Miss Kitty: "Mamma, will we know folks in heaven same as we do here?" Mamma: "I think there is no doubt of that, my dear." "Will I know Jane Gopplins?" "Who is Jane Gopplins?" "She's the big freckled girl that lives over the grocery store down the street." "If you are both good enough to go to heaven, my dear, you will certainly know her." (After some moments of profound cogitation) "I won't have to speak to her, will I, mamma?"—Chicago Tribune.

Correspondence.

WATERLOO, IND., Jan. 19, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I have a little time I will write to you. I did not go to school to-day because it was examination for the large pupils, and the first, second, and third grades did not have to attend. I go to school in a little brick school-house in the country, and there is just one room in it.

It is good sleighing now, and we have lots of fun jumping bob-sleds during recess and noon. Franklin Steiner and Mrs. Krekel wrote to us and wanted to come here and lecture, but our opera house burnt down last summer and we could have no lecture. My sister Gracie got a letter from a little Kansas girl, Miss Gina Wolf, and she sent us a paper with Mr. Charlesworth's wedding notice in it. I will cut it out and send it to you. It was in the Wichita Eagle. From your little Free-thinker friend, HATTIE SALTSMAN.

[Thanks for newspaper cutting. Please describe Waterloo next time you write.—Ed. C. C.]

WALLA WALLA, WASH., Dec. 28, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I have been thinking about writing to the Children's Corner for some time, but was afraid I could not write good enough. I am going to school and learning to spell, read, and write. I am seven years old; I have one brother and one sister, both older than myself. My papa is a Freethinker; he has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time. I like to look at the pictures and read the children's letters. The preacher came to see us last week; he said he was around getting acquainted. I don't think he will come to see us again, for papa gave him THE TRUTH SEEKER to look at, and he was much surprised to think anybody was so wicked as to read such a paper; he said he was a missionary all the way from Kentucky; came to organize Sunday-schools to teach us "poor little heathens" to be good. I do not go to Sunday-school, but stay at home and play with my dolly, or go visiting. If I see this in the paper I may write again. SUSIE SHELTON.

[You have done well, Susie, for the first letter. We shall be pleased to hear from such a bright girl often.—Ed. C. C.]

CLOVERDALE, VA., Jan. 1, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is not the January winds and rain that have caused me to fly to your Corner. I was attracted by the bright and merry chatter of the boys and girls. But why is it that some of the young men and women do not join the circle? The old year has come and gone, and I wonder how many new resolutions have been made. I know that I should like to give you a short history of our country if I were allowed space, but I fear, should I attempt this, Miss Wixon would turn it over to the waste-basket. I am an Infidel. I have two brothers and one sister. My father and mother are Christians; they belong to the German Baptist church. I like to read that good paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER; I think that it is the best journal published. There are not many Freethinkers down here; everybody seems to believe in the ghost book. Oh, what a glorious thing it would be if we could open the eyes of the blind, then the church bell would be heard no more, and the preacher would have to work for his living instead of sponging on the poor blind church-members.

Correspondents wanted; feminine gender preferred.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE: The Effect of Each on Personal Status and Property Rights, with a Consideration of Fraudulent Divorces and Ethics of Divorce. For Popular and Professional Use. By Henry C. Whitney, counselor of the Supreme Court of the United States. Philadelphia: John E. Potter & Company. Cloth, 8vo., 377 pp. Price, $3.50.

This is a valuable work, in that it furnishes the student or reasoner the basis of facts which he must have if he would draw approximately correct conclusions. It is a very full exposition of the nature, history, and legal aspects of the marriage contract, and shows the effect of marriage and divorce on personal status and property rights. It gives a summary of the divorce laws of the various states of the Union and of Europe. There is a chapter on what the author calls the "evils of fraudulent divorce." Simmered down to its essence of fact and intent, this offense is seen to be purely technical, legal, so far as the consenting principals are concerned.

We find in the volume a mass of accurate and well-arranged information for the use of the general public, and copious references to legal authorities for the professional use of lawyers. The author declares that women everywhere are demanding the abrogation of laws which are out of harmony with modern conditions, and that this growing sentiment of revolt naturally leads to the making of extravagant claims. What is imperatively needed to-day is a sound knowledge of the facts, of the history and development of the marriage relation, and of the changed social conditions that operate to make reforms in the laws of divorce an absolute essential of health and growth. It should have been added that the study of positive science has done much and in the near future will do immeasurably more to alter our ethical standards and thus lead to the liberalization of the legal conditions that hedge about the sexual relations. The publishers observe that "Marriage and Divorce" is at once "a social study, an essay on morals, and a handbook of law." When it is asked what the object of the writer is, what the book advocates, the publishers present this summary of the author's arguments:

"1. The vastly increased demand for divorce is the outcome of the changed social and economic conditions of life. Where people used to live simple lives in villages and towns they are now thrown into crowded cities, with more distractions and temptations, from enlarged social circles and much travel.

"2. Though multiplicity of divorce be an evil worse evils would ensue if this remedy were refused while the causes remain.

"3. A limited area of divorce is not compatible with the enfranchisement of women.

"4. Judicious statesmanship, and not abstract morality, is the desideratum for the wise operation of divorce law.

"5. While marriage may be a religious sacrament, it is practically a legal contract, so to be dealt with.

"6. The field for reformers is the social world; let the causes for divorce be abridged, and divorce as an effect will be abridged also."

The gentlemen who, in almost every department of human relations, are so anxious to save "society" from dissolution by means of more and more restrictive and oppressive and cruel legislation will find in the last preceding paragraph food for serious reflection. "The field for reformers is the social world"—that is, instead of Puritan statutes what is needed is education, sympathy, improved economic conditions.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: WAS HE A CHRISTIAN? By John E. Remsburg. New York: The Truth Seeker Company.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Ex-President Lincoln's belief so far as religion is concerned. Soon after his remains were laid to rest at Springfield, Dr. Holland, one of his biographers, put forth the claim that he was a Christian.

This claim was denied, reaffirmed, denied again—and so the controversy continues. Like a shuttlecock being tossed from battledore to battledore was the question waged until Mr. Remsburg took it up to satisfy himself. For fifteen years he collected material, and to his own satisfaction proves that "Honest Old Abe," who controlled the destinies of the nation during the dark years of the Rebellion, was a Freethinker.

He presents an apparently very strong array of testimony in support of his views, giving the evidence of at least a hundred persons—intimate associates—among

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

whom is no less a person than Mrs. Lincoln, the wife of the great man.

Mr. Remsburg claims that in 1835 Lincoln wrote a small work on Infidelity, in which he contested the idea that Jesus Christ was the true and only begotten son of God, as the Christian world believes.

Later on, when he was a candidate for Congress, one of the arguments used against his election was that he did not believe in Christianity, and that he had openly proclaimed that Jesus was an illegitimate child.

The author also gives the testimony of twenty witnesses that Lincoln died a Christian, ten of whom admit that he had been an unbeliever during a portion of his life.

It is an interesting work on account of the object of the author's arguments. Everything concerning "Old Abe" is read with interest by the American people, but it is a question whether they are ready to adopt the doctrines put forth in this book, and believe that the President, whose name ranks second to none of those who have reached that high elevation, did not believe in the existence of a God.—Philadelphia Item.

CHURCH PROPERTY: SHOULD IT BE EXEMPT FROM TAXATION. New York: The Truth Seeker Company. Price, 15 cts.

Within the one hundred and ten pages of this pamphlet are contained all the facts and figures necessary to convince any impartial mind that the church, in stealing its taxes in the name of exemption, is the enemy of honest government, of good society, and of mankind.

The work is most admirably constructed, and is arranged to present the matter bearing upon the subject in the most forcible way.

It begins with a plain statement of the injustice of exemption from James A. Garfield, in these words: "If you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a tax upon the whole community."

Twenty years ago the Republican party was alive to the dangers of ecclesiasticism, and Grant and Garfield advocated the just taxation of all property equally, as the best means to disarm a wily foe, that was only waiting to strike at the heart of political freedom. To-day every political party is dumb on the question of church taxation. What power has shut the mouths of the two great political parties of this country? There is but one answer—ecclesiasticism. There is, however, a revival of interest in this question, and the agitation bids fair to result in some legislation that will correct the evil of exemption.

This pamphlet discusses the alleged reasons for exemption, and shows the wealth possessed by the different Christian denominations, and arrives at the conclusion that "Exemption of church property from taxation is dangerous."

This work should be generally distributed. It will do more to open the eyes of the people than legislative hearings from now to the end of time. It is a valuable document for Freethought.—Investigator.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Gems of Thought.

It is in the order of nature, however, that men's habits and pleasures are not to be changed suddenly. For any permanent effect to be produced it must be produced slowly.—Herbert Spencer.

It is impossible to say of any false belief which mankind have had, that it has been the most pernicious in its effects; but we may truly say of the theological notion of the relations of mind and body, that it has been surpassed by few false doctrines in the evil which it has worked.—Dr. Henry Maudsley.

The good cause never dies, and it is never defeated. Its defeats are but the recoils of the battering-ram from the wall that is fated to crash in; its deaths are like those of Italian story, where each man cloven in twain by the sword of the slayer springs up two men, mailed and armed to slay.—William Douglass O'Connor.

WHITMAN is the founder of a new religion, which accepts and rejoices in the body, glorifies it, and consecrates it to chastity, magnetism, and purity. The entrenched religion which put him down is ascetic, anti-naturalistic, and spurns the body and its thrilling nerves as the work of the devil. That is the secret of the Boston suppression, so-called, of "Leaves of Grass." It is simply a case of the Thirty-Nine Articles versus nineteenth century science—jealousy of the new by the old.—William Sloane Kennedy.

The earlier Renaissance gave to man the right and liberty to think and act as he, in his own judgment, saw fit. The Renaissance of to-day is leading men to think, not only with personal freedom, but accurately and rightly. Far be it from me to say that I believe that mankind in general are very much nearer to accurate and just standards of judgment than they were four hundred years ago, but the spirit of to-day favors untrammelled and searching investigation of every question in which man is concerned, a critical comparison of the results of such investigation, and a frank intolerance of all illogical or unsound theory and application.—G. Brown Goode, in Science.

As for personal morality—this has not been affected by religion pure and simple in any country. Human nature is everywhere the same. If the Christian says that the Hindoo religion is bad because, for instance, of polygamy, then I say that the Christian religion is worse for the same or a similar reason. Christian missionaries have carried to India fine reports of the Christians they have left at home; and they carry to Western nations the worst reports of the so-called heathen abroad. The Hindoos, therefore, think that all the Christians in the Western nations are good people, and the Americans think the Hindoos are all bad. Alas! both are mistaken. I found this out after I came and saw the Christians at home.—P. R. Telang, in the Forum.

As to the ladies and gentlemen questions, all I can say is, Would that every woman-child born into this world were trained to be a lady, and every man-child a gentle-

Church Property

in the United States.

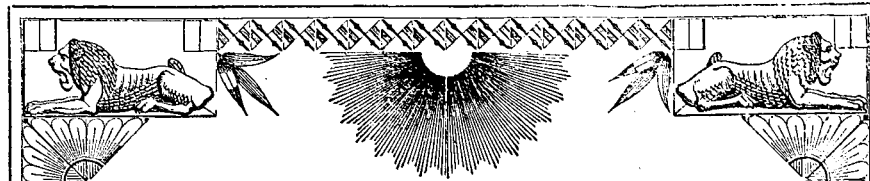

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies, $1.00
Fifty copies, 4.50
One hundred copies, 8.00

man! But then I do not use those much-abused words by way of distinguishing people who wear fine clothes, and live in fine houses, and talk aristocratic slang, from those who go about in fustian, and live in back slums, and talk gutter slang. Some inborn plebeian blindness, in fact, prevents me from understanding what advantage the former have over the latter. I have never even been able to understand why pigeon-shooting at Hurlingham should be refined and polite, while a rat-killing match in Whitechapel is low; or why "What a lark!" should be coarse, when one hears "How awfully jolly!" drop from the most refined lips twenty times in an evening.—Thomas Huxley.

CIVILIZATION, in its best sense of culture of the whole man, advances with the growth of the imagination. Care for the poor, provision for the infirm, humanity toward weak races, and aspiration for international peace, gain strength with the expansion of the imagination gift. To know one's neighbor—that is, to vividly appreciate the likeness of nature between him and ourselves—is to sympathize with him. Just as, without artificial excitement or external force and apparatus, a mutual understanding and fellow-sentiment springs up between men of the same profession or tastes or political aims, so, quite naturally and inevitably, the perception of human kinship in passions, necessities, weaknesses, and hopes give birth to a mutual sympathy. By sympathy manners are refined with a subtle delicacy which no courtly training can impart. Through sympathy the dark places of the earth will be enlightened, and the solution of social problems be rendered clear.—F. J. Gould.

Not that I object to you hearing Mr. Dunlop, but I'm sure ye widna like yer ain sheep straying away into strange pastures." Rory: "I widna care a grain, sir, if it was better grass."

THERE is a milk boy in Kelvinside avenue, Glasgow, who disturbs the neighborhood for six days in the week by continually ringing a bell in the early morn. But he is a good boy, and has been reared in a Sunday-school; he knows it is very wrong to ring bells on Sunday except they happen to be church bells, so he compromises the matter by industriously rattling a stone in a milk-can. O blessed Sawbath!—Freethinker.

BOSTON STREETS AND PREACHERS' PATHS. One day through the primeval wood A calf walked home, as good calves should,

But made a trail all bent askew, A crooked trail, as all calves do.

Since then two hundred years hav fled, And, I infer, the calf is dead.

But still he left behind his trail, And thereby hangs my moral tale.

The trail was taken up next day By a lone dog that passed that way;

And then a wise bell wether sheep Pursued the trail o'er vale and steep,

And drew the flock behind him too, As good bell wethers always do.

And from that day o'er hill and glade Through those old woods a path was made.

And many men wound in and out, And dodged and turned and bent about.

And uttered words of righteous wrath Because 'twas such a crooked path;

But still they followed—do not laugh— The first migrations of that calf;

And thro' this winding woodway stalked, Because he wobbled when he walked.

This forest path became a lane That bent and turned and turned again;

This crooked lane became a road Where many a poor horse with his load

Toiled on beneath the burning sun, And traveled some three miles in one.

And thus a century and a half They trod the footsteps of that calf.

The years passed on in swiftness fleet, The road became a village street,

And this, before men were aware, A city's crowded thoroughfare.

And soon the central street was this Of a renowned metropolis.

And men two centuries and a half Trod in the footsteps of that calf.

Each day a hundred thousand rout Followed this zigzag calf about;

And o'er his crooked journey went The traffic of a continent.

A hundred thousand men were led By one calf near three centuries dead.

They followed still his crooked way And lost one hundred years a day.

For thus such reverence is lent To well-established precedent.

A moral lesson this might teach Were I ordained and called to preach.

For men are prone to go it blind Along the calf-paths of the mind;

And work away from sun to sun To do what other men have done.

They follow in the beaten track, And out and in, and forth and back.

And still their devious course pursue To keep the path that others do.

But how the wise old wood-gods laugh, Who saw the first primeval calf.

Ah, many things this tale might teach— But I am not ordained to preach.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rambling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces. We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free. F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O. The Milliad.

(1000 STANZAS)

A Poem of Justice and of Liberty.

By J. L. TREUTHART, B.L.

Gathering the ethical or moral elements from Greek mythology, and applying the test of the Golden Rule to the world's history, the author has demonstrated that the liberty and life of the nation depend upon a recognition of the principle that

The poem is in ten Cantos (100 stanzas to each canto), as follows:

- I.—Themis Enlists the Muses to Battle for the Right.
- II.—The Olympian Council.
- III.—The Goddesses in Consultation.
- IV.—Phebus, Apollo, and Liberty. A Romance in High Life.
- V.—Sketch of World's History to 19th Century.
- VI.—History of the United States. Twofold Nationalism.
- VII.—The Theory and Nature of Coercion. The Fratricidal War.
- VIII.—Reconstruction and Subsequent Politics. A Satire.
- IX.—The Columbian Exposition.
- X.—The Parliament of Religions and Its Sublime Lessons.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

THE troops have been withdrawn from Brooklyn, it being supposed that the police would be able to maintain order, but so far there has been considerable rioting, non-union motormen being the chief sufferers. There is a demand for the forfeiture of the charter of the companies and the Board of Aldermen has revoked the licenses of two.

A SWEEPING anti-gambling measure has been introduced in the New York legislature. Not only does it forbid pool-selling and book-making, but it makes it a felony for any one to aid or abet the principals, which means that anyone who puts down a bet, or offers to do so, is liable to a heavy fine or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. Gambling upon the future price of stocks is also provided against, and almost every form of speculative investment except insurance is forbidden under very heavy penalties.

THE amount of savings bank deposits varies greatly from year to year. That for 1894 shows a decrease of more than $46,000,000 from 1893, but it is an increase of over $26,000,000 from 1892 and of $214,000,000 from 1890. Massachusetts has 1,214,493 depositors, with $399,995,570 to their credit; New York has 1,585,115 depositors, with $617,089,449 credited to them. The two states together have 2,799,648 depositors, with $1,017,085,019 to their credit, while the entire country has only 4,739,194 depositors, with $1,739,006,705 on deposit. This is largely due to the fact that in the two states named the small capitalist invests in the savings bank, real estate being practically out of the market except for those with large capital, while in the other states the small capitalists invest in land.

Something QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

The Persistence of Superstition.

We learn from the Spokane Chronicle that Washington is afflicted with a band of so-called prophets who are predicting the speedy dissolution of human society and the establishment of a heavenly-earthly kingdom of God which is to endure for a thousand years. The prophets are giving the Washingtonians the genuine old gospel of hell fire as it was preached before the midnight blackness of Christianity was lightened up a little by the mild rays of Universalism and Unitarianism and shot through here and there with the electric brilliance of Freethought. They have been preaching in Tacoma and are now planning the invasion of other cities. The leader of the crusade appears to be an aged preacher named Price. He has a staff of men and women who are as enthusiastically demented as he is and help him exhort and threaten the people. There are the usual symptoms of religious hysteria—women jumping on to the benches and shouting incoherent professions of piety, men rolling on the floor in paroxysms of happiness, men, women, and children wildly “seeking the Lord and his kingdom.”

The prophets' belief may be briefly summarized as follows: The spring of 1892 was the end of the 5,993d year of Adam; the spring of 1899 will see the completion of the 6,000th, and the end of the world. During the four years that intervene between now and the general winding up of things terrestrial nine-tenths of the earth's inhabitants are to be cut off by a swiftly recurring series of wars, famines, plagues, earthquakes, and hail. Anti-Christ will also put in an appearance in this troublous time and lead astray those who are not immune against the wiles of confidence men. The prophets are not sure that Satan will not come along and help Anti-Christ play for the stake of human souls. Sometime during 1899 Christ will take a hand in the game, and disastrously eucher both his famous but unscrupulous opponents, casting them into hell, which place we are told is a burning lake of sulphur inside the earth, five thousand miles in diameter. The surveyor's name is at present unknown to us. Thus the bad are all finally disposed of and the saints can have a picnic without fear of interruption.

Of the people who are left after this nine-fold

decimation 144,000 are to be translated out of the original sin into heaven, without dying. Heaven is a lovely crystal city, 1,500 miles square, hanging in the air in sight of the earth. Here these translated and revised bijou editions of God are to remain in a state of perfect happiness for one thousand years while the righteous and resurrected one-tenth of earth's inhabitants are reveling in the millennium below. God will send his civil engineers, his pioneer corps, his sappers and miners, his ditch diggers, and his gardeners, who will level down the mountains, clear the swamps and jungles, and make the deserts to bourgeon and bloom. He will likewise clarify the atmosphere, and the sun will shine seven times brighter than ever before. Our super-scientific prophets do not condescend to enlighten us as to how the righteous will contrive to adapt their eyes to this septuple glare, for the one thousand years will be but a moment of time as compared with the eons it has taken our visual organs to become adjusted to the present radiance of the sun. Unless there is to be a miracle on tap that seven-fold augmentation of the sun's light will instantly strike every creature on earth stone-blind. Least of all can the followers of the lamb stand any increase of effulgence, for even now they have to shut their eyes when the soft beams of truth reflect in their faces.

At the end of the millennium, after the earth has completed its cycle of seven thousand years, it will return to chaos and be once more “without form and void.” We don't know why God is going to drop the curtain just at the moment when the players have got their parts tolerably well learned, but we comfort ourselves with the reflection that our ignorance in regard to this is no greater than that of Mr. Price and his fellow soothsayers. For the benefit of any Christian who may read this and be unable to see that it has a lesson for him, we will say that the Bible which he accepts as the word of God is responsible for the direction which the lunacy of the Washington prophets has taken, and their preaching of “revealed truth” will very probably upset other poorly balanced minds—minds better equipped with faith and credenceivness than with common sense and scientific knowledge.

The Irrepressible Conflict.

A citizens' association has been formed in Racine, Wis., for the enforcement of the Sunday statutes and ordinances. The intention is to close all theaters and other places of amusement as well as the business houses. This shows, as it has been shown a thousand times before, how hypocritical is the pretense of the Sundayites that they wish to give the workman a day of “rest.” The manager of the opera house was acquitted when tried last, and on a previous trial the jury failed to agree.

The fact that the enemies of the Free Sunday are working for the aggrandizement of the church instead of the lessening of the burdens of labor was made very clear by the utterances of Rev. R. C. Wylie, one of the most prominent leaders in the God-in-the-Constitution movement, at the recent convention at New Castle, Pa. He said:

“Formerly, the demand for Sabbath laws was based largely on humanitarian grounds. It was said that we should have such laws because men needed to rest one day in seven. But some of us said, That will never do; that is not the correct basis for such legislation. And now Christian people have come to the conclusion that we must have a Sabbath law because God has one.”

Which means that the day worshippers now perceive that it is an abandonment of their position to base the demand for Sunday statutes on utilitarian grounds. That would be fatal to them in the end, for if it is once admitted that recreation on Sunday is needed to give the people proper rest, then it would become simply a question of the amount of Sunday “desecration” that would be physiologically allowable, and the answer to this question would open all the libraries, reading-rooms, museums, galleries, parks, and seaside resorts, set the excursion trains to running, keep the suburban and city car lines busy, and the news stands, restaurants, and other places of entertainment open, as well as give the millions who want their Sunday paper the opportunity to get it. No wonder the six-day people fall back on their “Thus saith the Lord.”

The National Temperance Society appears to have degenerated into a Sunday observance organization. Its board of managers has recently issued an appeal against the changing of the Excise law of this state, on the ground that such change as is contemplated would surrender the “Lord's day” to the saloon, and it wants to know what the Christian men and women of the state think of the proposition. Why this dragging of religious prejudices and beliefs into the controversy over the Sunday opening of the saloons? The only question at issue is whether we are to continue to have two sets of laws, one for Sunday and the other for the days from Monday to Saturday, inclusive, and this solely in the interest of the clerical profession. Temperance is not the issue, for if it were the clergy would be as bitterly opposed to the week-day sale of liquors as they now are to the Sunday sale of the same. If temperance were the bone of contention the Sabbatarians would not antagonize the sale of papers, the running of street cars, the opening of museums and galleries, and the transportation of the mails on Sunday, as they are doing. The National Temperance Society, as a temperance organization, has no business to appeal to the Sunday superstition; when it does it ceases to be a temperance society and becomes an auxiliary of the Sabbath Union. The demand of the Freethinkers is that there shall be one law for all days alike. Let the opponents of this just principle meet us frankly instead of trying to throw dust in the eyes of the people by obtruding the question of temperance, which properly has no place in the discussion of Sunday laws.

W. T. Gibson, an Adventist of Everett, Mass., was arrested on the charge of violating the statute made for the protection of the “Lord's day,” by selling a half pound of candy to a spy whom the mayor had sent to his place of business to purchase it. Mr. Gibson conducted his defense himself. He began by proposing to show by the Bible that he had not committed his alleged offense on the said “Lord's day,” but the prosecuting attorney objected and Judge Pettengill told the defendant that the tribunal was a civil, not an ecclesiastical court. The humble Adventist very quickly showed his honor that he did not know what he was talking about, for he promptly said:

“The summons which brought me before this court is by virtue of a law respecting an establishment of religion; and the very wording of the summons necessitates a religious controversy. The summons does not accuse defendant of doing work on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, but on the ‘Lord's day,’ and I desire to read from the Lord's book a few scriptures, which will explain why I plead not guilty of doing business on the Lord's day. The Lord's book is the only authority which can decide which is the Lord's day.”

After this absolutely crushing retort poor old moribund Massachusetts' unhappy judge could only feebly murmur, “Go on, Mr. Gibson,” while the prosecuting attorney was no longer visible to the unaided eye. Of course the Adventist had no difficulty in proving that the “Lord's day” is not Sunday, the period of time which the bigoted and blundering law carpenters of Massachusetts thought they were hedging about with prohibitive legislation for the benefit of the Lord's priests. Evidently the judge was fully convinced, for, while he assessed a fine of fifty dollars and the costs, he was careful to say that he would not attempt to defend his decision except to cite a precedent of a higher court. Mr. Gibson appealed his case, and it should have been tried long ere this, but at our latest advices it was still pending, although the defendant, who is a man of small means, has tried to secure a prompt trial. The outrage is a monstrous one, but millions like it are possible under our miserable Sunday laws, and the prospect grows darker rather than brighter.

"National Reform," which of course includes as one of its principal demands the rigid enforcement of existing Sunday laws and the enactment of as many more as may be needed to utterly destroy what little liberty we still have on that day, is undoubtedly increasing in strength in some parts of the country. The Christian Statesman says that about twenty years ago, when Drs. Sloane and A. M. Milligan conducted debates in New Castle, Pa., not a paper in the city favored National Reform, the editor of one taking part in the discussions on the negative side and throwing the influence of his journal against the schemes of the theocrats; "a representative lawyer and the pastors of two of the largest congregations of the town were on the same side. Public sentiment was very generally with these opponents." About three months ago a National Reform convention was held in New Castle, as has been before stated in these columns. The paper from which we have quoted above says that to those who took part in the meetings a score of years ago and who also participated in the late convention "the change was incredible."

"Every one of four daily papers of the city spoke in highest terms of commendation of the National Reform cause. Prominent men who had no sympathy whatever for that cause much less than twenty years ago came out with the most radical and ringing utterances in its favor."

The enrollment was nearly five hundred and the attendance outside of the enrollment was large. The enthusiasm was in direct ratio to the radicalism of the speakers, and the financial responses were very generous considering the prevailing monetary stringency. The latest report of the treasurer of the National Reform Association shows a fund for propagandistic purposes amounting to $1,425, besides a special fund for the printing of the proceedings of the New Castle convention. Free-thinkers and all other friends of the free state should do some very serious thinking during this year and then make up their minds to do at least as much for liberty as the theocrats are doing for the enslavement of the people of this Union. The Covenanters are going to raise thousands of dollars to subvert the Constitution and establish a theocracy. One synod is pledged to secure $7,000. If we resolve to be free we can do as well.

"Sabbath" conventions not previously noted here were held in Oxford and Altoona, Pa., the latter on Feb. 14 and 15. There will be a National Reform convention in Boston on Feb. 19 and 20. In the Christian Statesman we find a paragraph in reference to the terms "Sunday laws" and "Sabbath laws." The writer holds that "Sunday" is correctly used only when it refers to the first day of the week as a civil division of time, that is, "when the idea of the Sabbath as an institution of rest and worship is entirely wanting." "Sunday paper" is right, because it means a journal printed on the first day of the week in violation of the Sabbath. "Sabbath school" is the right phrase if a school is meant which is "for the promotion of what is in support of the rest and worship of the Sabbath."

"So a law for the purpose of preventing Sabbath desecration is properly a Sabbath law. A Sunday law is one like that of Louisiana, which simply places the first day of the week on a level with such legal holidays as the Fourth of July and Christmas. It contains no implication of the sacredness of a day of rest and worship, or of the institution of the Sabbath. But in our states generally this institution of a rest day and a day for worship is most clearly kept in view in the laws concerning the first day of the week. The proper designation of these laws, therefore, is Sabbath laws, and not Sunday laws. And we are sure that it would lead to a better regard for these laws as based on the divine law itself, if they were always designated in our statute books and in courts as well as general and popular usage by their right name."

We have quoted this from the organ of the National Reform Association, the editor of which is one of the high priests of Sabbatarianism, because we want each of our readers to cut it out and put it in his note book where it will always be instantly accessible should some advocate of Sabbath laws try to make him believe that those statutes are not in fact religious and intended to be such by their authors and defenders. The Sabbatarian does not want a civil rest day; he will never be contented with such a day; what he wants and means to have is a holy day, a day of worship "based on the divine law itself." Sabbath laws are religious laws and nothing else. The foregoing quotation is from the Christian Statesman of Feb. 2, 1895.

The Catholic Union and Times very neatly retorts upon our Protestant neighbor, the Observer. The latter journal having declared that "there is not in all the word of God a passage that can be quoted in support of an early and fasting communion," the Buffalo paper thus counters:

"Neither is there a single text of scripture to authorize you to change the Lord's day from the seventh to the first day of the week. Why have you done so? Because the Catholic and Apostolic church from earliest Christian days has substituted Sunday for the Jewish Sabbath for solid and resplendent reasons."

Protestant Sabbatarians can look in this mirror and see themselves as others see them. But we think it was cruel for the Catholic organ to tell its heretical brethren that there is no reason why they "should remain fasting to partake of their communion, since it is nothing but bread and wine," while the children of the Faithful Mother have a genuine cannibal feast on the real blood and porterhouse of the man-god. With the original Christian, the Catholic, on one side of him and the Atheist on the other, the poor Protestant is in a tight place, and we need not wonder that he is fearfully illogical and continually contradicts himself.

City Registrar Whitmore, of Boston, is very much against permitting Spiritualistic lecturers to perform marriage ceremonies, and he contends that marriages so solemnized are invalid. This has resulted in the presentation of a petition to the legislature asking that incorporated bodies of Spiritualists may be authorized to empower their lecturers to solemnize marriages. Still Mr. Whitmore is not satisfied; he seems to think that while it is all right for "ministers of the gospel" to be invested with this power, it will lead to widespread confusion and disaster if the Spiritualist lecturers and Salvation Army officials are granted the same privilege. We are afraid the registrar is a little prejudiced. If marriage is regarded as a civil contract which the state only can authorize, it would appear that it may select whom it pleases as its agent, and in this view of the matter the Spiritualist lecturer or the Salvation Army captain would probably have as good claims as the minister. The state could just as legitimately delegate this power to a civil engineer or an editor as it could to a preacher. State authorization to solemnize marriages makes the person so authorized an officer of the state, so far as that one function is concerned, and it would undoubtedly be less of a menace to the freedom of the citizen to delegate the state's power to the civil engineer and the editor than it is to permit the ministers to exercise it.

The Christian Advocate says concerning the case of the cashier of the Dover (N. H.) National Bank—also connected with the Five Cent Savings Bank and treasurer of the city, a deacon, and the most prominent worker in the Free Baptist church, who proved a defaulter, and mutilated the books of the bank to hide the evidence—that "if he had been an unbeliever in religion, a Spiritualist, an Atheist, anything but an evangelical Christian by profession, it would not be mentioned in all the papers of the land. It is the inconsistency with the principles of Christianity that attracts attention to such instances of hypocrisy and corruption." This is absurd. With the stupidity or dishonesty born of faith, Dr. Buckley reads his lesson backwards. The frequency of these lapses on the part of good Christians shows, instead of the moral drawn by our distinguished evader of truth, that Christianity has no power to restrain men from doing evil. The argument that the church is a "moral force," or "police force," is knocked galley west by these exposures, which have become so frequent that a reputation for piety nowadays is a bad reputation in the business world. Only the ignorant and gullible trust an offensively pious man, for it is beyond dispute that faith and morals have no connection with each other, and the greatest scoundrel can be as sincere a believing Christian as the good woman who believes because she has been taught to, and never stops to think about the matter.

A bill has been introduced in the legislature of Colorado for the taxation of church property. The subject is being discussed in the Denver Times. Mrs. Holly, one of the members of the assembly, is in favor of this bill, although she is a church member. A Christian named Mr. Green, who resides in the county she represents, very sharply criticizes her for the attitude she has taken. He asks her where and what she would be in any but a Christian country. She would be a beast of burden, an animal, nothing else, he tells her. This will give you an excellent opportunity to show what the Bible and Christianity have not done for woman. Mr. Green says that Mrs. Holly, as trustee of her school district, tried "to prevent the people from holding the Sunday-school sessions in the school-house which their own money had built." He also asks, Why not tax the school-houses in Pueblo, instead of paying interest on the bonds voted for their construction, if churches are to be taxed. This is a splendid opening for making clear the difference between public property, like school-houses, and private property, such as churches. He observes that "only one-fourth of the people pay the whole cost of the churches, when in fact, all should pay it. Therefore, this fourth carries a heavier burden in church expenses than it should. Yet now it is proposed to assess that fourth still more." This means that the whole people of the state should be taxed to help pay for what only one-fourth of the people want. Would that be honest, would that be just, would that be keeping church and state separate? Exemption is a lesser evil only than direct taxation to build and maintain the churches. The difference is one of degree, not of kind. Of course all pledged members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will write to this target, and we hope that at least a hundred more will do the same.

Because a man either accepts or rejects certain dogmas pertaining to supermundane places, persons, and conditions, it does not necessarily follow that he is or is not intolerant. Mere belief regarding these things does not make one either a bigot or a Freethinker. To perceive the truth of this, read the two paragraphs which follow. The first is from a sermon preached by Rev "Sam" Jones in Memphis; the second was written by an Infidel for an Atheist paper:

"Some of you think if a man's honest in his opinions he's all right, but you're wrong. There's many a man in hell who believed honestly that there is no such place, but if you could fish him up, bud, he would say: 'Boys, I was mistaken; don't you be fooled, too.'"

"I think I hear some one say, 'About matters of religion every person has a right to his own opinion.' I deny it. When a person forms an opinion growing out of emotional insanity—i. e., Christianity—i. e., X-insanity, transmitted ignorance—i. e., hereditary fool in the head, and such opinion not only makes him unhappy, but works an injury upon his fellow man, then he has no right to such opinion."

The spirit of the two teachers is identical, and it is needless to say to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that that spirit is utterly foreign to the spirit of Freethought. The Christian preacher and the Infidel writer would both punish a man for an erroneous belief, that is, a belief which they could not share. One would punish him for believing that there is a hell and the other for rejecting that belief. The worst feature of Christianity is its intolerance, and when a person who leaves the church retains the desire to persecute he has brought with him the worst and most dangerous element of the religion that he supposes he has outgrown. This is what the early Protestants did when they left the fold of Rome, and now such Infidels as the one from whom we have quoted above should read the history which those Protestants wrote in blood and flame and turn from the error of their ways lest some Remsburg of the future shall be forced to write an "Image-Breaker," telling the story of "Infidel Intolerance."

Our readers will remember that a short time ago, in a trial of lynchers at Memphis, Tenn., a witness tried to be excused from going on the stand to testify against the accused, who were his friends, on the ground that he was an Atheist, as the laws of that state at that time forbade the acceptance of the testimony of unbelievers. It was very important that the fellow should be examined, as the prosecution had no other witness who could tell what he could, and so the presiding judge, after thinking and praying over the matter one night or more, decided that the self-styled Atheist was lying, that he was a good Christian after all, and that therefore his testimony could be accepted, for, being a Christian, of course the oath would be binding on his conscience! That is, had he been telling the truth when he said he was an Infidel his testimony could not have been accepted in any court in Tennessee, but as it was admitted that he was a Christian and a liar he could be a witness in all the courts of the state. This performance made Tennessee law the butt of ridicule all over the country and, as the outcome has shown, shamed the legislators of that belated state into tardy recognition of the fact that it was a hundred years behind the age. The sitting legislature has enacted that "Hereafter persons who do not believe in God and a future state of rewards and punishments may be witnesses in any case pending in any of the courts of this state. Said unbelievers may solemnly affirm instead of taking an oath, and false testifying by said persons shall be punished as perjury, as now by law under like circumstances. Such unbelief in God and a future state of rewards and punishments shall go only to the credibility of the witness."

This is a very long step in advance for Tennessee to take, but she is not yet entirely out of the wilderness of superstitious injustice. There is no reason why the witness's non-belief in any dogma should be permitted to affect his credibility. The creed-bound jury should not thus be authorized by the law to discredit a man's testimony merely because he does not believe as they do, and we hope that the statute makers of Tennessee will soon amend the new law so that the Freethinker will have precisely the same rights in the courtroom that the Christian now enjoys.

Our genial contemporary, Puck, is usually pretty clear-headed, but occasionally its various observations fail to "consist." This was very noticeably the case in the editorial department of its issue of February 6th. In one paragraph it speaks in warm praise of ex Gov. Robert E. Pattison, candidate of the "reformers" for mayor of Philadelphia, saying that the "decent voters of all political faiths are rallying about him, just as they rallied to the support of Mr. Strong in New York," and it wishes Philadelphia as good a start out of the swamp of corruption by the election of Mr. Pattison as New York has out of the same swamp by the election of Mr. Strong. Now, if Puck were a Sabbatarian paper, its support of the theocrat Pattison would be rational and consistent, but as it is a friend of the free Sunday we are at a loss to understand its attitude. In the paragraph immediately following the one devoted to the Philadelphia contest it champions Mayor Strong as against his so-called temperance enemies and the other Sabbatarians who are so savagely attacking him because he is not willing to try to enforce a Sunday law which produces law-breaking ten times worse than the evil it is alleged to prevent. Puck finds fault with the spokesmen and spokeswomen of the people who are reminding Mr. Strong that they worked hard to elect him and that therefore he should do as they command. Now is it possible that Puck does not know that the same meddling societies are at work in the Pennsylvania city in behalf of Pattison, and that if he is elected they will make the same demands upon him that their New York congeners are making upon Mayor Strong, but with a far different result? Is it not aware that Pattison as governor was hand in glove with the Sabbatarians and effectually blocked all measures intended to modify the antiquated and ridiculous Sunday laws of the state? We have nothing whatever to do with the religious opinions of Robert Pattison, but we are opposed to the election to any office of any man who will use the powers of that office to force his religious opinions upon his fellow citizens; and we have believed that Puck was equally opposed to such union of church and state. What, then, does it mean by supporting Robert E. Pattison, who has been guilty of this very offense against the Constitution of the nation and the liberties of his countrymen, and who, if elected to another office, will, in all probability, offend in like manner again?

The Woman's National Sabbath Alliance, an auxiliary of the American Sabbath Union, was organized in this city on February 7th. Its especial work just now will be to try to prevent any modification of the laws relating to liquor selling on Sunday. The Sabbath Union addressed a memorial to the legislature praying that body not to adopt any of the bills now before it which would open the liquor stores any part of the first day of the week. But Rev. Dr. J. H. Knowles, who drafted the memorial, lifted his priest's robe high enough to show the cloven hoof of the "Sabbath" Satan. He made it plain that it was not the Sunday sale of liquor to which the Sabbath Unionists primarily objected, but the Sunday sale of anything except sermons and church organ music. He said distinctly that they protested, not only against the legalizing of Sunday liquor sales, but against the legalizing of any traffic, however innocent in itself. The memorial is really a sermon, abounding in the stock phrases of the theologian. The legislators are told that God reigns and that millions of his people would be grieved if they, the legislators, should do anything to weaken the hold of the Lord's day on the public conscience. It is said "with reverence" that God himself entreats the legislature not to do anything the Sabbatarians do not like, and it is covertly threatened that he will "somewhere, at some time, and in some way" get even with the legislators if they disobey the ministerial mandates. There was an amusing incident in connection with the formation of the Woman's Alliance. The members were asked to take this pledge:

"We, the women of America, recognizing the American Christian Sabbath as our rightful inheritance, bequeathed to us by our forefathers, as the foundation of our national prosperity and safeguard of our social, civil, and religious blessings; as the conservator of the rights of the wage-earner, do hereby pledge ourselves to resist, by precept and example, whatever tends to undermine the Sabbath as a day of rest and worship, such as the Sunday secular newspaper, social Sunday entertainments, and Sunday driving and traveling for personal convenience, gain, or pleasure, and we further pledge ourselves to exert our influence to create a right sentiment on all aspects of the Sunday question, especially in reference to traffic of every kind on that day."

Inasmuch as most of these pious women are merely dress-parade Sabbatarians, organized for the purpose of making other people go in the direction they point, they were amazed when one of the women present was found to be possessed of an old-fashioned conscience. She said that she approved of the objects of the society, but could not conscientiously take the pledge. "I would like to visit a friend on Sunday and would want to take a street car, but could not if I signed the pledge." The real good women were too astonished to say anything for some minutes—such a tender conscience was a marvel to them. Finally several managed to suggest to her that she "seek light in prayer"! What frauds these "Christian reformers" are!

The Friendship Liberal League, George Longford, secretary, meets at 2:30 and 7:30, every Sunday in Warner's Hall, Broad and Wallace streets, Philadelphia. Freethought publications are on sale at the meeting.

Observations.

That fiscal remnant, sarcastically alluded to as the gold "reserve" in the United States treasury, got down to forty-one millions the other day, and the crisis was deemed sufficiently grave to justify our always great and good friend, Mr. Grover Cleveland, in running the country deeper into debt. He therefore announces a new set of bonds for his constituents, the idea being that when people are tied so tightly as to be unable to free themselves their condition may be ameliorated by new ropes to draw blood. The syndicate of speculators who have been doing what they could to reduce the treasury remnant so that the issue of bonds must cover the hundred millions prescribed by law, are much disappointed, not to say injured in their finer sensibilities, to learn that the issue is but sixty-five millions. It is said there is murmuring among them, as among a pack of philanthropic wolves that do not realize as much gore as they smelled. Mr. Abraham Lincoln had views about those who fatten on the necessities of a government or a people in distress. He was once discussing the subject with Governor Curtin of Pennsylvania, and inquired: "Curtin, what do you think of those fellows in Wall street who are gambling in gold at such a time as this?" Mr. Curtin mildly replied that he thought they were sharks. "For my part," continued Mr. Lincoln, as he smote the table a great thump with his fist, "I wish every one of them had his devilish head shot off."

Mr. Remsburg, in his book on Lincoln, quotes some of the war president's most lurid profanity to show that he could not have been called eminent for piety under a rigid construction of that term. The foregoing language, to be found in Carpenter's "Six Months at the White House," might have been cited by Mr. Remsburg as tending to establish two propositions—first, that Mr. Lincoln was not eminent for piety; second, that he was something of a humanitarian.

The anniversary of the birth of George Washington, esqr.—accredited by his friends as the father of his country, and accused by his enemies of being the father of persons to the affiant unknown—recurs on the 22d day of this month. It will come again next year at the same time. If living he would now be one hundred and sixty-three years of age, but he was not spared. It is not easy to present anything fresh and actually dewy about the subject of this memoir, but I believe that I shall hit him off under a new heading when I speak of him as

THE MAN WHO COULD LET GO.

You must know, then, dear reader, that Washington was one of those rare individuals among office holders who realized that there was such a thing as enough. He occupied numerous military positions from the lowest to the highest, besides the office of president, in all of which he displayed the virtue of resignation. From 1755 to 1759 he was commander-in-chief of the forces (two thousand men) which the assembly of Virginia ordered to be raised for the defense of the province. This office he vacated by resigning.

In 1775 he was unanimously elected by the Continental Congress commander-in-chief of the Continental army. Having discharged his duty for eight and one-half years, he resigned.

At the successful close of the Revolutionary war there were those who, being blind to the purpose of the rebellious colonies, favored crowning him king of America. The notion met with popular indorsement, but Washington declined.

In 1789 he was elected president of the United States without opposition. Near the expiration of his second term a demand was made that he serve a third time. But Washington declined.

At other critical periods of his life, also, he evinced a clear perception of what constitutes a sufficiency. While with General Braddock, in 1754, on the expedition against Fort Duquesne, four bullets passed in succession through his clothing, and he retired.

In after years, when he attended a church in Philadelphia, the pastor took occasion to animadvert upon his custom of leaving the sanctuary before the sacrament had been administered. Washington thereupon remarked that henceforth he would trouble neither the clergyman nor his congregation on such occasions. "And ever after that," writes a biographer, "upon communion days he absented himself from church." In the mind of him of whom I speak, enough was as good as a communion feast.

Finally, on December 14, 1799, the last month of the last year of the century, he sank under an acute disease, and died. A few hours before his death, being asked with what feelings he contemplated his approaching dissolution, he replied: "I look upon this event with perfect resignation." G. E. M.

The Church and Its Methods, Its Power and Its Weakness.

Once the church was a tower of strength. When it trained its artillery on a man it could make him comply with its requisitions, or destroy his influence, ruin his character, break up his business, and drive him out of the country like a whipped spaniel.

To-day its fortunes are crumbling, its walls are breached, and the people are laughing at its Quaker guns. Once it was imperious and dictated the legislation and ruled the courts and had power over the liberty and lives of men.

To-day it crawls in the dust and plays the whining sycophant and invokes the aid of law to accomplish what it once was able to accomplish by brute force. And instead of saying to the public, "Stand and deliver," like a blind beggar it holds out its hand and humbly asks for penny gifts. What sums it cannot raise in this way it obtains by fairs and shows and sneak tricks and gambling.

A burnt-cork troupe gave a series of entertainments in our village, and drew larger audiences than usually assemble at the churches. Of course this burnt-cork entertainment could be approved of only by the split-foot fraternity, so the manager of the M. E. Theater made up his mind to give an entertainment where the lambs of God could play together in such a caressing manner as to be approved of by those who inhabit the upper country. After the burnt-cork troupe had departed, the following announcement, which I give verbatim, was conspicuously displayed through the village:

That must hav been a great "nite" for old Joss. No doubt he opened the big book and gave the M. E. Theater a long credit mark and then sent down the Holy Ghost to spoon around among them and inspire them with a "feller feelin'." Kaliker must hav been in great demand that "nite" even if badly soiled. Probably the performance was opened with prayer, and then they sang:

How happy are they
Who their Savior obey.

This made old Joss feel so good that he took a fresh chew of Cavendish, laid back in his old arm-chair, crossed his legs, and made the heavenly arches ring by singing:

My pets are all happy and jolly and frisky,
Let joy be in heaven, so pass round the whisky.

No doubt there was a great deal of work done in the Lord's vinyard that "nite." As on other similar occasions, probably there was a pretty Miss Tiptoe so nearly sanctified that she would let the saintly young bucks kiss her for ten "sents" apiece "for the glory of the Lord." If any of my Christian friends are shocked at the idea that God chews tobacco and drinks whisky, I would like to ask them if they don't believe that he had been taking a "horn" when he revealed himself to Moses? We sent a man to jail for that very offense, and he was drunk and chewed tobacco; and any god that has no higher sense of propriety than to display himself in that manner will chew tobacco and drink whisky.

At these pious entertainments, after a blessing has been invoked by the Rev. Mr. Toperust, the regular business of the evening begins. It is a veritable penny-in-the-slot game. Grab bags, lottery chances, and low gambling that would shame a common gamester, are the order of the evening. God's gambler's are supposed to enjoy privileges which the ordinary gamblers never claim. In the name of him who commanded them not to covet what belongs to another, and not to lay up treasures on earth, they bake a valuable gold ring in a big cake and sell the pieces at two shillings each, with the understanding that everyone who buys a piece has a fair chance of getting the ring. But Mrs. Thoroughgrace marks the place in the cake where the ring is located, and Deacon Lovejust draws the prize. Thus the ring is saved to the church, and yet in the name of God they scoop the boodle. One or all of these low-down snap tricks and gambling devices have been practiced in the different churches, and no doubt God has been glorified and humanity uplifted.

Christ told the Christian to sell what he had and give to the poor. That is a kind of medicine which he takes in homeopathic doses. Instead he hires the poor at starvation wages; he tries to keep the Bible in the schools, and works in the interest of the church in order to turn out more such Christians. These pious snobs lay great stress on a day of rest; but many will work their old horses all the week, until their heads droop and their ambition is gone, and then they will drive them a half dozen miles to church, so that they can have a rest. The Christian's God has no sympathy for old horses.

The Christian says you must love your enemies, and then he shows his love for his enemies by locking them up because they do not spend the Sabbath as he says they must. A man who has been confined to the office or store all the week mounts his bike Sunday morning to take a turn through the country, to have a change and enjoy the open. Deacon Longface says he is a child of the devil; but if he runs his wheel a dozen miles to church, then he is a child of the savior partner. To skate on Sunday for diversion is to incur the wrath of God, but a lot of good Christians can skate down the river to church, and it is all right. Come on bikes, come on skates; God will throw up his hat and shout, "Bully for you!" when you come to church, no matter how you get there.

If there is a heaven for hypocrites, what a vast crowd will be gathered into the inclosure! All of this pretended anxiety about a day of rest is just Christian rot. When they claim that they want the parks and the museums, the libraries, the art galleries, and all places of instruction and amusement closed on Sunday in the interest of good morals, they lie, and, what is more, they know they lie. Christians are well aware that these places have greater attractions for the people than long prayers and the Rev. Flamdoodle's sermons, and they think that if these places are closed up the people will come to church. But the people are no longer afraid of the devil, and Heston has got all the hell there was in a big pot; in short, the masses no longer pay attention to the old theological racket, and the church seeks to maintain by compulsion the position it can no longer hold by deception.

Some years ago we suffered the misfortune of having an evangelist visit our town. The first move he made was to extort a promise from every business man in the place that he would close his establishment every night during the meetings. His policy was to shut up every other place so that the people could go nowhere except to church. Here is the secret of the whole Sunday-closing business; the object is to force men to attend places where the proceedings can only fill the intelligent with disgust, as starving men are sometimes reduced to the extremity of eating food that nauseates the stomach.

The teaching of the great necromancer of Galilee has so far perverted human nature that Christians believe that it is pleasing to God for them to walk backward and to stand upon their heads. After a slugger has battered one cheek, it is as unnatural to turn the other also as it is for a man to stand upon his head. The fool Christian preaches peace on earth and good will to men, and then wants to put the thumbscrews on all who do not believe it natural for men to stand with heels in the air. Right here in the great Empire state only a week or two ago some pious grannies found what they called a "witch mark" on a child less than a week old. This wonderful find was reported, and some Christian ruffians assembled and stripped the father of the child naked, rolled him in the snow, daubed him with tar, then ripped open a featherbed and decked him out with a coat of feathers. And then they took the mother who had given birth to the child only a week before and treated her in like manner.

What would be the consequence if the government should be surrendered into the hands of such pious thugs? All Freethought literature would be blotted out and the authors imprisoned or burnt. The children of those who were believed to be enemies of God would be murdered as of old and their mothers ripped up alive. Such men as Ingersoll and Wakeman, Putnam and many others would be instructed by these holy pollywogs as to the duty they owe to God and the obligations they are under to the church.

I knew a man who was constantly under the influence of the "power." He did so and so, and thus and thus, because the "power" told him to. He was hopelessly insane. The men who committed the outrage on the father and mother of the child mentioned above had read in an old book that they must not suffer a witch to live. Now, I ask, what is the difference between these two cases of insanity? When the minds of men become so distorted that they believe every word in the Bible emanated from an all-wise God, and then read his command to utterly slay old and young, to kill all the camels and oxen and asses, and spare nothing alive to breathe; to burn and destroy and lay a whole country waste—is it safe to trust such men to guide the ship of state? A book which turns out such lunatics has no place in the schools.

A belief in an unerring God lies at the root of the evil. When men rise above the god-idea they will no longer ask for Sunday laws, or the Bible in the schools, or exemption of church property. Chaplains will be dismissed. Gods will find no place in the Constitution, and man will no longer persecute his brother for God's sake. As long as a man believes in God and the Bible he cannot be trusted, for passages of scripture can be found which will turn a man of humane instincts into a monster, and all the time he will think that he is an instrument in the hands of God to execute his will.

I do not ask the Christian to do as I say. If he wants to pray, let him pray. If he wants to go to church on Sunday and hear the Rev. Mr. Baldybeat Munchausen telling snake and fish stories, that is his privilege, and he must be defended in the exercise of his rights. If he wants to wear out the knees of his trousers in praying, and the seat in back-sliding, let him slide backward or forward, it is no concern of mine so long as he does not interfere with my rights.

Before the Christian tells me that it is my duty to pray, let him show that a single prayer was ever answered. What right has he to compel me to observe Sunday as he says? If I offend his heavenly Mikado by writing this article on Sunday, why not trust him to come down on me with his almighty whang-doodle as he thinks I deserve. The trouble is the Christian is all the time trying to do something to please his God before he knows whether he has an existence. Then guided by his old Jew-book he will outrage humanity and believes that his great holy Jumbo screams with delight at the infamy. What right has the Christian to infer that I would testify falsely because I believe in neither his lying old scrapbook nor his silly old imaginary dummy? What right has he to make me pay taxes on his gospel theater, when I am interested in neither his crucifixion plays nor their actors? It is high time for intelligent men to take a firm stand and expose the tricks of these holy thimblerriggers, and break up the game entirely. The spirit of our government is that every man shall do as he pleases so long as he does not infringe the rights of others. The trouble is, the Christian is not satisfied when his natural rights are secured to him, but he wants everyone to bend to what he conceives to be the will of his great celestial boss.

Years ago, when people could be scared by the torments of hell, and fooled with promises of eternal bliss in an imaginary heaven, a church could hold a protracted meeting every winter and rope in a couple of hundreds, who were as completely under the control of designing ecclesiastics as an army is under the control of a general. But the people begin to understand the tricks of these heavenly shysters. When a minister stirs up hell and talks about the undying worm and the smoke of their torment that ascendeth up for ever, the people think, if they do not say, "Let the undying worm wriggle;" and of the smoke of their torment, "Let 'er smoke;" well knowing that hell is an exploded myth. And as for the bliss of heaven, a title deed of a plot in the New Jerusalem isn't worth as much as a patch of huckleberries. Concerning God, the more intelligent have about as much confidence in him as they have in the mud gods of the Dyaks. The ordinary minister no longer counts when they want to raise the holy wind; they have to send off for an expert—one who has reduced deception to a fine art. He must himself be very dishonest in order to make his gospel racket a success. He must know how to manage an audience, just as an old salt knows how to manage a vessel.

The room must be kept at just such a temperature. If a current of cold air should be let in, the jig would be up. An outdoor camp-meeting in winter would be a dead failure. No shivering saints ever approach the anxious seat. God loses his power just as quick as the frost strikes him. Care must be taken not to let in any dogs. A dog fight just at the critical moment would scare the Holy Ghost out of his wits, and he could not be induced to hover around again until the next session.

Then the proper ones must be put into the "amen corner," and the responses must be given "just in the nick of time." Then there must be singers and shouters and groaners and whippers-in, and each must be drilled down to the nicest point of exactness. Every part of the machinery must work like a charm or no grist will be ground for the church. Then the minister must be full of magnetic influence. Understand, ladies! With all of these appliances brought to bear it would be wonderful if some Simple Simon did not get hypnotized and stand up with a face as long as a kneading-trough and say, "I want to find Jesus." Promptly the amen corner must be heard from. Some shouter sings out, "Glory to God." Another shouts, "Let God be praised." Then the minister tells the driveling idiot that he has been a great sinner from away back, then the groaners take a turn, but he says a plan of salvation has been opened. Jesus is waiting to be gracious. You must lean on the arm of Jesus. Then the singers come in play. At the word of command they sing:

Alas, and did my Savior bleed,
And did my Sovereign die,
Would he devote that sacred head
For such a fool as I?
Was it for crimes that I have done
He groaned upon the tree?
Old Olotie smiled to see the fun,
And had a jamboree.

As this is the season of protracted meetings, and as they have begun to stir up the monkeys in our town, I thought I would let the people into the secret of making a Christian. God has just as much to do with the process as he has with a lot of fellows who get hilarious over their "Tom and Jerry."

Christians may say that I ridicule Christ on the cross. It is not a man that I ridicule, but a system. And if they would rid their minds of superstition and give the matter an impartial examination they would see that the whole scheme is too ridiculous for serious consideration. Think of it—a great God getting mad because a woman ate some persimmons. God made the woman and gave her the appetite—planted the persimmons, and made a snake to entice her, and then raises "1" because matters turned out just as he knew they would. He came into the garden in the cool of the day, but what good did that do? Eve had gobbled the fruit. Why did he not put in an appearance earlier, in time to prevent the mischief? he knew what was going on. Then to reconcile himself to this Hudiabastic transaction he nailed his boy to a tree. Wasn't he a smart God? He ought to have nailed the snake to the tree, and not his son, who was such a promising young mechanic. Inasmuch as the snake had the power of speech it could have retorted, "Why do you nail me to a tree for doing just what you designed me to do?" O think of it, my Christian friend, a man crucified to keep you from going to hell because a woman ate some persimmons six thousand years ago!

You say I treat a serious subject with levity. It is not serious, it is simply ridiculous.

The time was when a certificate of membership from an orthodox church would be considered a guarantee of good character. And there lay the great power of the church. It was regarded as a great moral element. It had the power to elevate men to positions which they were not entitled to either by intellectual attainment or moral worth.

To-day no business firm that has places of trust and responsibility to fill is inquiring for church-members or Sunday-school superintendents or members of the Young Men's Christian Association. Confidence men, defaulters, and bank wreckers have been largely drawn from that source, and are no longer in demand. Receivers of bribes—those who pile up fortunes through blackmail—are notoriously supporters of the church. If the cloak of Elijah did not fall upon the great St. Anthony, many believe that he is clothed in saintly robes. Yet even he, according to report, has been levying blackmail, and his saintly robes have been worn to hide a black heart.

The idea of this great moral force which has attached to the church and held her in respected position, has nearly died out. The people are finding out that nearly all the great criminals are believers in the great Christian humbug.

Scientific men repudiate the whole supernatural delusion. What scientific mind believes that all the gods ever pictured in the human mind could take a cubic mile of nothing and make even a grain of sand out of it? Or, that they could reduce a grain of sand to nothing?

Who that has studied the law of gravitation can be made to believe that men ever ascended from the earth bodily? Once the church trampled science in the dust. To-day science is putting the church to the rout with all its miracles and gods and ghosts.

Christianity has cursed the world long enough. It has dried up the sweet juices of humanity and turned men into monsters. It has set back the progress of all Europe more than a thousand years. It has filled the minds of men with phantoms and myths. It has waged wars between those who thought only of the hereafter, and those who were laboring for better conditions here. The great necromancer impressed the belief upon the minds of his deluded followers that business would not be continued at the "old stand"—that the world would soon be side-tracked—that there were those living who would see the son of man coming in the clouds, and therefore, that the things of this world were of no consequence. But the old world is still turning on its axletrees without squeaking, and doesn't show any signs of getting phthisicky, and from present indications I am inclined to believe that she will stand the racket a year or two longer.

The great necromancer got ditched in his calculation, and the driveling imbecils have not seen him in the clouds or anywhere else up to date.

Christians have been led to ignore all that pertains to the well-being of this world, and to turn their attention to a world that never had an existence.

They have been living only for robes and harps and crowns and wings. And if I had to dwell eternally with sniveling Christians I would rather have a pair of horns than a pair of wings.

The whole system was founded on dreams, prophecy, miracles, fraud, and foolery.

From start to finish—from tap-root to topmost branch—Christianity is the most stupendous cheat and fraud that the human mind ever conceived.

At the Book Table.

WOMEN IN THE BUSINESS WORLD, or Hints and Helps to Prosperity. By One of Them. Boston: Arena Publishing Co. 12mo., 322 pp. Price, cloth, $1.75; paper, 50 cents.

This book preaches the doctrine of self-help for women. The spirit that animated the author is revealed in these two mottoes:

Out of the night that covers me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul.

It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll;
I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul.

"Self-support is as much the duty of a woman as of a man. The time is past for dividing the virtues. Servile dependence in money matters is no longer deemed honorable."

We find also this quotation from Margaret Fuller; "No woman can give her hand with dignity, or her heart with loyalty, until she has learned to stand alone." Of the purpose of her book, the author says in the introduction: "Its object is to help women to help themselves, which is the only kind of assistance that is of permanent value. It tries to point out the stumbling blocks in the path of the business woman, and attempts to show her how to avoid or overcome them. It endeavors to make it clear to her that her place in the Business World is not a corner fenced off by prejudices based on the time-worn idea of sex limitations; but that she is free to work in any part of it that she chooses, and is bound by no bonds save those which exist in her own mind. She has only her own permission to gain to do what she will. Less than half a century ago, the only occupations in which she could engage, with her own and the public's consent, were teaching, housework, sewing, and nursing. Now she may be anything from a lecturer to a steamboat captain, and the public respect her and give her its patronage if her work deserves it. The word business is used in this book in its most unlimited sense. It represents all the occupations in which people engage—agriculture, mechanics, the arts and sciences, and the work within the home. The Business World includes all the industrial affairs of life. No attempt has been made to give a list of occupations for women. That would necessitate mentioning all the industries known. Those spoken of are such as admit of greater development or are new to many readers."

The author has a saving message for all women, and that message is self-dependence. Unless they are self-dependent they can never accomplish anything, and must always remain feeble, undeveloped creatures, mentally, physically, socially, and financially. She well says that use, action, are the only means by which all growth is attained, and that it is the disuse of their faculties which have made women a weak and dependent class. It is as an individual, not as a woman, that she must shape her destiny. As an individual, her first duty is self-development. Grant Allen has expressed the same thought, applying it to the entire race, as does our author, but he has been wiser than she in that he has omitted unmeaning reference to "God." The struggle for existence strengthens, and the woman who has been sheltered and protected from all knowledge of this struggle has missed something which would be of inestimable value to her if she could know it.

The woman who has pushed out into the fierce battle for bread has been more favored than her hot-house sister if it has taught her to stand alone. "The ability to stand alone, without fear, no matter how empty the purse or how hard the winds of adversity blow, is the most precious possession a human being can have."

Among the many subjects treated are these: Self-salvation; women's greatest need; finding one's true calling; training and efficiency; perverted pride; the road to success; business philosophy; condensed commercial wisdom; little keys to fortune; things necessary to know; important points; helpers and hinderers; the seed of wealth; economic blunders and benefits; a story and a sermon; saying and doing; the allurements of science; the liberal arts; the written word; where there is room for more; some new and old occupations; caring for others; behind the counter; examples of success in horticulture; country home industries; breaking rough ground; daily bread; woman's historic weapon—the needle; within the home; cheering facts; the fatherhood of employers; women are the masters of their own fate. Of course this gives no adequate idea of the variety of facts presented and information imparted by this work, but the table of contents is too copious to reproduce in the limited space available. The topics treated herein are handled in a common sense, practical manner, and this is what gives the work its exceptional value. We should like to make many quotations from it for the pleasure of our readers, but must content ourselves with what follows:

"If the word 'servant' could be abolished the class it describes would also vanish with it, and the home be cleared of the worst of all features of our domestic economy, the presence of inferiors, which is destructive to a wholesome mental atmosphere. The home is intended as a place of ease, complete relaxation when relaxation is needed, and the enjoyment of the society of members composing the family. All these are disturbed by the presence of inferiors—that is, beings of a lower class intellectually, having nothing in common with those they serve. The principles of co-operation applied more extensively to the management of the home would solve the problem of domestic service satisfactorily. Wherever it has been tried understandingly it has not been found ineffectual. Take your social equals, not your inferiors, into the home. That will abolish bad service and unpleasant influences, besides ennobling household labor, and thereby benefiting all civilization."

THOMAS PAINE, THE AUTHOR-SOLDIER OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION: The Good and Evil of His Life and Writings. By George Lippard. With Portrait of the Author. Philadelphia: J. B. Elliott, 3515 Wallace st. Paper, 16 pp. Price, 20 cts.

This pamphlet is the report of a lecture delivered in Philadelphia on Jan. 25, 1852. It was never before printed as a whole except in the New Era, a weekly newspaper printed in Philadelphia in the year named. The author had a very great admiration for the political works of Thomas Paine, and he possessed the courage to publicly express that admiration in a time when Paine was even less popular than he was, say, twenty years ago. But Mr. Lippard defended the memory of Paine in spite of the further fact that he was himself an earnest Christian and reprobated the sentiments expressed in the "Age of Reason." For this he is certainly deserving of honor, as well as for the services in behalf of humanity which he rendered in many another unpopular cause. He was a prolific contributor to the magazines of his day and was an editor himself at one time. He counted among his acquaintances most of the literary celebrities of the time, and Edgar Allen Poe was a personal friend. Among his labors are to be reckoned his experiments in coöperative work, his endeavors to have a portrait of Paine placed in Independence Hall, and his efforts in favor of free land, and against slavery and the unequal position of woman. He early called attention to the imprisonment for debt of Robert Morris, the financier of the Revolution. His tribute to Stephen Girard was a valuable testimonial to the strict integrity of that famous Infidel and philanthropist.

Lippard was savagely severe in his denunciations of the "Age of Reason," and Mr. Elliott intimates that he had not read it, being acquainted with only the descriptions of it and disconnected extracts found in the religious press. His present biographer hopes that the Freethinker of to-day will be lenient in judging him, and take into consideration the fact that it was then impossible to obtain Paine's heretical work "except under cover of the greatest secrecy, and he who was known to have read it was shunned as a dangerous person."

News and Notes.

I did not know that I would have to come down to a freight car and be transported like live-stock or baggage; but I had to pile into a box-car, or it was no go from Prescott to Phoenix. The rains had so demoralized the embankments alongside the railroad that there was not room for a passenger coach to pass by; and I had to take the aforesaid method of travel, and recline the best way I could on boxes and baggage for the repose of my weary bones. There were about a dozen passengers with me, and we all took it good naturedly and enjoyed ourselves as best we could in the crisp morning air, as we went winding about the lofty mountains, where the carpets of snow glittered, soon to be succeeded, however, by tropical colors. It was a beautiful journey. Varying and vast prospects appeared before the view; huge rocks, tremendous precipices, granit hills, luminous valleys, immense peaks, canons and defiles mingling in splendid and wild confusion. Thumb Butte, which towers over Prescott like an enormous thumb, transforms itself into a stupendous crouching lion as we sweep by, with an appearance of awful strength and ferocity, as if it were ready to leap upon the great world beneath. We mount several thousand feet, and then begin our descent into Skull valley, where a few tents of pioneers greet the eye, and wide desolation spreads on every side, hemmed in with lustrous walls of mountain. But the snows have disappeared, and the sky hangs soft and bright. There is ethereal mildness in the air; and as we proceed southward the warmth and brilliance increase. At about the middle of the afternoon we arrive at the end of the track; and here we take a stage for Phoenix, forty miles away. I mount the front seat of the somewhat forlorn vehicle, and we proceed at a fair pace over the rough ways; and though we get a considerable shaking up, the views are so magnificent in the evening sun that I take no note of weariness. The golden sunset falls radiantly over the vast expanse, and for a hundred miles away we see the beaming heights. The pathway of the glorious sun, as it disappears, is followed by a lovely moon, which transforms the scene into a picture of strange and haunting beauty. The dusty plain seems like a jeweled floor, and the mighty hills are lost in the twinkling darkness. By and by the moon drops below the horizon, and we travel by the light of the innumerable stars. At midnight the electric radiance of Phoenix bursts upon the sight, and in the early morn I find myself comfortably in bed at the Central Hotel, where the light of Freethought shines in the face of the genial landlord, Joe Thalheimer. At 9 o'clock I awake in the beauty of the summer's day and find Phoenix alive with all sorts of people from all parts of the world. I enjoy the delicious sunshine and the green landscapes that spread around, and the flowers that bloom. I find old comrades, J. B. Lacy, J. H. W. Jensen, and others, and arrangements are made for lectures, Feb. 6th and 7th. The legislature is now in session, and I hope to have a chance to talk to them, and keep them up to the mark of secular politics. The governor, under the sway of the Methodist church, has recommended the passage of a Sabbath law, and we may expect a fight on that point, and also on church taxation. A copy of "Church Property" has been given to each member of the legislature, and I hope they will profit by the reading of it. I am looking forward to good work.

The campaign at Prescott closed in a blaze of glory with the Paine Celebration on Tuesday evening, January 29th. The Opera House was crowded to its utmost capacity. The music was furnished by the Prescott orchestra, the members of which are Jules Baumann, S. Slessenger, an old-time friend of Phoenix, C. Wilbanks, and Carl Miller, and we are under obligation for the excellent service which they rendered out of pure love to Thomas Paine and the great cause which he so nobly represented. Jules Baumann sang the "Star Spangled Banner," and aroused the patriotic enthusiasm of the audience. The opening address of Dr. Miller was a fine delineation of the work of Thomas Paine in the American Revolution. Charlotte M. Hall eloquently portrayed the career of Thomas Paine in England and France. This was her first appearance before an audience, and she was applauded to the echo. I am sure that our young friend will be one of our most brilliant representatives upon the Freethought platform, and will carry our flag to victory when we older heads have made our pillow in the dust. It is inspiring to look forward to these workers of the future. George E. Macdonald's poem, "Paine: The Knight Errant of Freedom," was finely rendered in its melody and strength of thought and ringing hope by Mrs. M. E. Miller, and the poet and his fair interpreter and the "Knight Errant" himself received the ovation of the listeners. Mr. Jules Baumann sketched a life-like portrait of Thomas Paine which ornamented the center of the stage, wreathed with flowers and evergreens, and when Mrs. Miller pointed to this noble presentment, the cheers of the audience were unbounded. Mrs. Lizzie Jacks, formerly of Denver, where she assisted the Freethought work, fairly captured her hearers with her lovely songs. She closed with singing "John Brown" to words written by her husband for the occasion, and these martial strains swept along as in the years gone by they rang at the head of our marching columns. Prof. W. S. Bell mingled philosophy and comedy as he depicted the "Age of Reason" and the closing scenes of the life of Thomas Paine. In every respect the occasion was a memorable one for Prescott. It has stirred the people, and enlightened them with the great ideas of Freethought and American history.

Comrade Upton gives me a delightful drive Thursday afternoon from Phoenix to Tempe. As the Salt River is still impassable, I was obliged to walk over the railroad bridge which stood the brunt of the tempest without flinching. At Tempe I find a warm welcome. I give a lecture in the evening to a full house, although a revival is going on at the same hour with considerable excitement. But the Freethought wave keeps moving on. I should have had, without doubt, the largest audience of all if I could have stayed another evening, but the railroad trains run in such a way that I must leave without continuing the work, in order to meet my appointment at Tucson.

Old friends are still at the post at Tempe. Mr. and Mrs. Chas. T. Hayden and Carl Hayden are among our most generous allies. I always find a welcome at their beautiful home—all the good things that make a Pilgrim rejoice, with art, philosophy, poetry, and the amenities of life. I wish I could linger longer in this happy retreat. With Mr. Hayden, I visit the Normal school, where I find that the methods of modern education prevail under its able and cultured teachers. I also drive over to Mesa, and visit a notable Mormon settlement. I especially enjoy a visit with Uncle Ben Johnson, a leader in the church, who had seven wives in good scriptural fashion and about forty children. He is hale and hearty at seventy-seven years of age, has had a great experience all over this western country, in Mexico and the isles of the Pacific. He says he is ready to listen to any truth, and he has a great admiration for Ingeroll. I have no doubt he will improve as he grows older. He has a chance yet to become a pioneer Freethinker. Like the rest of the "Saints" he is dropping many of the old habits and customs of the church, and is in the line of modern progress. The Mormons of this section are generally of good stock. They are taking hold and developing the resources of the country.

I meet some Oregonian friends here, Mrs. Keenan and Mrs. Patterson from Portland. Mrs. Keenan is well known for her devotion to humanity and is always ready to lend a hand to the sick and suffering. Our Liberal friend, Mrs. Atkinson, has a severe trial. Her son was recently shot by an insane man. It is hoped that he will recover, but he requires constant attendance. All our sympathies are with our comrade thus laid low. R. M. Robertson is still on duty. I met many new friends here; and so Tempe is becoming more attractive as one of the advance lines of Freethought. I am sorry I did not have time to organize the forces, but this will come in the future. Mr. Hayden is a host in himself. He has been in this territory from the beginning, and knows it by heart. No man has done more to develop the country. He has been engaged in great business transactions, and mills and stores and fruitful lands are the result of his persistent industry. He has traveled extensively from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He is from Connecticut, and the spirit of that Yankee land is in his laborious and daring undertakings. Mrs. Sallie D. Hayden has the glorious hospitality of the frontier, and there is no lack of vivacity in her elegant home. She was the first white woman to locate in this territory, and she has had a varied experience of its wonderful fortunes; has seen it grow from a desert to a land flowing with milk and honey and radiant with the fruits of the tropics. In Arizona at this time we find culture, refinement, wealth, and splendor equal to that of the East; and Mrs. Hayden represents the pioneer woman and also the woman of to-day.

Carl Hayden, now in attendance at the Normal school, promises to be at the front rank with the banner of "Excelsior."

I cannot mention all the names of old and new friends at Tempe, but I feel that this will always be a place of charming repose and fruitful toil in the "bivouac of life."

I leave Tempe Friday evening at nine o'clock, about, and arrive at Tucson at three o'clock in the morning of Saturday; a tedious midnight journey it is. Isaac E. Crum, who mainly organizes our work at Tucson, is at the station to receive me, and provides good quarters where I am soon sound asleep, and do not awake until the sun is high in the cloudless heavens. I find things in pretty good condition at Tucson. I have large audiences both Saturday and Sunday evenings. I was to lecture on Sunday afternoon, but two horse races and bicycle races were going on, and everybody went to them, for the people are fond of amusements in this country, and Sunday is about the only time they have, and so I didn't object to the recreation, as probably the ministers do. At present there is no Sabbath law in Arizona. Sunday is an all-round holiday.

I give two more lectures here, and I will write up Tucson in my next "News and Notes." This is a quaint and curious place. The old Spanish atmosphere pervades it. It has a Mexican flavor and aspect. Most of the houses are built of adobe and are one-story. The cathedral towers in religious gloom, and the Protestant churches flash with orthodox brimstone. On the whole there is an abundance of ancient theology in Tucson. It is, I believe, the oldest city in the United States, and that perhaps accounts for its strata of remote ages. But there is a live American population here, full of progress and ideas, and they are working and building for the future; and they will succeed, and this will one day be a beautiful city, with a beautiful country around it, with extensive harvest fields and gleaming canals, so that to the blue mountains that edge the glowing horizon there shall be golden fruit, green grasses, wandering herds, and flowery paths, with homes embowered in the splendor of tropical luxuriance. Don't think that Arizona is a desert. When science comes and religion disappears untold wealth will flash to view.

Tucson, Feb. 4, 295.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Lecture Notes.

Muncie, Indiana, is a town of about twenty thousand, and one of the prettiest villages I ever saw. Here I was booked for two lectures. The leading spirit of our movement in this vicinity is Dr. T. F. Bowles, an outspoken Infidel, but the most popular physician in Muncie. The Spiritualists are strong, and are doing a grand work for Freethought as well as for their own peculiar views. The second floor of a planing-mill owned by Mr. Mang, one of their number, has been plastered, painted, and remodeled into a beautiful hall for lectures, where I had two fine audiences. The churches are numerous and powerful. The papers would hardly announce our meetings. They rely upon the "conspiracy of silence" to defeat us, but the success of our meetings proves it a failure. The "dignified silence" of the church when criticised is the silence of guilt, and shows it to be a cowardly as well as a hypocritical institution. Pulpiters have many times admitted that they have no resources adequate to convert the Infidel whose mind is independent and who reads and thinks for himself. Their sermons are only to "confirm the faith" of those already in the fold of Christ. Their business is to produce a perpetual eclipse, blinding their dupes to the fact that they are the slaves of priestcraft. I cannot remember the names of one-third of the Liberals whose acquaintance I made in Muncie, so I will not try to mention them. To the efforts of Dr. Bowles and several others is due the fact that we had good-sized houses. It was a pleasure for me to visit the doctor in his office, where I found in abundance the works of the best authors. Huxley, Haeckel, Darwin, and particularly Herbert Spencer, are his favorites. He has delved deep into these great masters and is thoroughly familiar with their works.

Leaving Muncie with pleasant memories, on Sunday I find myself in Cincinnati. As on my two previous visits, the Ohio Liberal Society flourishes, and the welcome of Light, Hogg, and Allen was as cordial as ever. The cultured and attentive audience of Cincinnati Liberals again greeted me. The society is strong and is doing good work, and for this reason the church hates it. The program, both for the future and in the past, includes some of the best and most prominent speakers. Probably no Freethought society in the United States has had so many paid lecturers since its organization. Geo. E. Light is president and James R. Allen secretary. Andrew Hogg, the ex-secretary, is as active as ever in the ranks. Mr. Wilm, Dr. Wilson, Mr. Patrick, and Dr. McLeod are strong supporters. Dr. Wilson is a thorough believer that Christianity and all other religions arose from symbolism and phallic worship. He understands this subject thoroughly and has given several lectures dealing with it. The Ohio Liberal Society has the support of both brains and money. Those who work also pay, and none is to be found actuated by selfishness. The fact that such organizations are sustained proves that more could be. Why, then, are they not?

FRANKLIN STEINER.

The Cause in Oregon.

We have accomplished a great deal of work in Oregon the past two years, but I feel better over the organization of the Silverton Secular circuit, than anything else. Christian ministers all over the state have talked of the "dead Silverton Secular Union." Could they have been present at the organization of the Silverton Secular Sunday-school, January 27th, and at the celebration of Paine's birthday in the evening, they would have been compelled to admit that Secularism in Silverton is a very "lively corpse."

The Silverton Secular Sunday-school starts out under the most favorable auspices, with an attendance of eighty-eight; and the demand for extra lessons indicates a larger attendance at future meetings. The following are the officers of the Silverton Secular Sunday-school: Pearl W. Geer, superintendent; C. W. Younggren, secretary; M. Fitzgerald, librarian; Miss Sophie Wolf, musical director, and John Hicks, treasurer.

The groups were conducted as follows: Kindergarten group, Miss Wolf; Wixon group, Mrs. Langley; Paine group, Dr. L. D. Guiss, and I had charge of the Progressive Bible class. These are only temporary leaders and by next Sunday, Superintendent Geer will have selected all assistants, leaders, and guards, ready for next report. Here, as in the rest of the Secular Sunday-schools in the state of Oregon, we celebrated Paine's birthday, all the literary exercises being on his life and work. We are very fortunate in having the captain of the Sons of Veterans, Lewis Aldridge, one of our members, and he will take charge of the marching.

It is pretty generally known that the Secularists of Silverton own a fine, large hall, and on this occasion it was beautifully decorated with mottoes, ferns, ivy, and flags. On the stage, in front of an eighteen-foot flag, artistically draped, was a large picture of Paine, surrounded by ferns and potted plants; in fact, the ladies and gentlemen who arranged the decorations paid a handsome tribute to the originator of our country's name.

The Silverton orchestra, composed of Messrs. Roy Russell, H. G. Allen, Neal Cooley, John Hurst, and Carl and John Steelhammer, played several fine selections in the evening. The members are very bright young men, and with one exception are Secularists. They donated their services, and volunteered to furnish instrumental music for our future meetings. Miss Myrtle Buff, a talented elocutionist, delighted the audience by her rendition of a comical selection and it would not be satisfied until she responded to an encore. The most taking part of the program was "Sweet Little Buttercup," sung by little Dell Davenport, June Buff, Lena Slater, and Ethel Smith. They are bright children and reflected credit on their teacher, Miss Wolf.

The subject of my address was "The Lesson of the Life and Labors of Thomas Paine." We are delighted with the work of our Silverton friends—all warm, genial, earnest men and women. On this trip I am entertained at the beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. A. Wolf, where the moments fly all too quickly. The following are the new members of the Oregon State Secular Union at Silverton: Edwin Langley, H. L. Allen, T. W. Davenport, Elvira Walters, Thos. Walters, H. G. Van Valkenburg, Sophie Wolf, Harry and Alfred Desart, Alfred Down, M. E. DeGuire, Louie J. Wolf, C. W. Younggren, Albert Whitlock, O. J. Cooley, Mrs. Josie Leanord, A. G. Hefferman, G. R. Gilmore, L. D. Leanord, C. Arnett, Dr. J. W. McClure, Mrs. E. L. Smith, Lewis Aldridge, John B. Hurst, J. M. Madison, Lincoln Davis, G. E. Johnson, E. L. Smith, and M. Fitzgerald. Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Scott and Dr. and Mrs. Guiss, of Woodburn, were present at the Silverton celebration.

What a contrast to these earnest friends do I find at Barlow, where I lectured on "The Evolution of Gods." Since President W. W. Jesse and his family moved from here, the wings of Free-thought have been clipped. However, O. W. Quint, and a few others, still stand by the cause. I find a cordial welcome at the large and handsome home of Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Irwin, whose hospitable welcome makes up for the opposition of ignorant, intolerant Christians, and the shoddy, second-hand aristocracy of Barlow. The audience is not large, but very appreciative.

At Canby, where I lectured on "The A. P. A. and J. O. U. A. M., Dangerous to our Liberties," upwards of 175 were present. Canby is a live town. We have several staunch Liberals, but none more earnest than Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Lee and their bright family. Little Ora is a born Freethinker, and one of the most pleasant recollections of my trip is this charming child, who looks forward to the coming of THE TRUTH SEEKER each week; though but five years old she "likes to read the pictures."

At this home, I meet Mr. Clyde Phillips, the grandson of that good Secularist, Wm. Phillips, of Clackamas, and it is refreshing to note his enthusiasm for Free-thought.

The following joined the Union at Canby: H. A. and Mrs. Eda E. Milo, George and Elvira Lee, George Mayer, William and Emil Krueger, H. C. Gillmore, L. P. Howard, Clyde Phillips, and J. T. Hensley.

In response to the appeal for funds to pay expenses of legislative committee, the following have been received: Mr. and Mrs. W. W. West, $5; Mrs. Eva West and John Price, each $1.

KATIE KEHM SMITH,
Sec. Oregon State Secular Union.

Celebrations of Paine's Anniversary.

Fully eight hundred people gathered at the North Side Turner Hall in Milwaukee on the evening of Jan. 29 to do honor to the memory of Thomas Paine. The audience was composed chiefly of the members of the Freie Gemeinde and the Turner societies, under whose auspices the meeting was held, although some local labor leaders were present. The hall was profusely decorated, and on the stage was a picture of Paine, draped with the American flag. The music was furnished by the North Side Musical Circle. The speakers were Henry Smith, and Dr. H. O. Fordmann, of Mayville. Mr. Smith regretted that so few native Americans were present, and he indignantly asked where the members of the societies called "The Sons and Daughters of the Revolution" were. Whose name could they better honor than that of the Author-Hero of the Revolution? The country has grown great and rich, but men's rights have not kept up with the times. Education alone can better conditions. Dr. Fordmann spoke in German, reviewing Paine's history, and the part he took in the War for Independence. Miss Metha Laue rendered a solo; the choir of the Freie Gemeinde and of the German-American Teachers' seminary gave several choruses, while the Misses Emily Bauer and Anna Holigrefe gave recitations.

The National Spiritualists' Association observed Paine's birthday in an appropriate manner at its headquarters in Washington. Toasts were responded to by President Barrett, Milan C. Edson, B. B. Hill, Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, Mrs. A. M. Glading, and others.

Aaron Lavis, as usual, celebrated Paine's birthday at his farm near Frederic, Maryland. A special feature this year was the consideration of the encyclical of Leo. In his call for the meeting Mr. Davis says that he has not been in a church for twenty-five years, neither drinks, chews tobacco, nor smokes, and he pays his debts.

The celebration at Paine Hall, Boston, was exceptionally full and interesting. At the morning conference short speeches were made by Messrs. Rockwood, Frazer, Smith, Mendum, and others, and Mrs. Joyce. In the afternoon the addresses were by Mattie A. Freeman and Solomon Schindler. The music consisted of a chorus by the singing section of the Boston Turnverein Society, and an orchestral contribution. Between the afternoon and evening sessions a banquet in honor of Mrs. Freeman took place. Short after-dinner speeches were made by a number of men and women. At the evening session the chief speaker was Susan H. Wixon, followed by Mr. Bowtell. Participants regard this as one of the very best Paine celebrations ever held in Boston.

The Germans also held a meeting in honor of Paine at their hall in Emerald street, at which one of the speakers was Mrs. Freeman, and, as before indicated, they co-operated with the friends at Paine Hall, furnishing very fine choral music.

Mt. Ingersoll, in Chehalis county, Washington state, lately described by a correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, is not the only mountain on the Pacific coast that bears the name of the loftiest of men. In the year 1890 a party of prospectors in the untrodden portions of Fresno county, California, outlying the mining camps of Grub Gulch and Fresno Flats, ascended one of the high peaks of a spur of the Sierra Nevadas, and, formally erecting a monument thereon, gave to it the name of Mount Bob. And not less graceful was the further act of these hardy climbers in selecting the highest eminence contiguous thereto and bestowing upon it the name and distinction of Putnam's Butte.

WANTS NO SUNDAY LAWS.

EDITOR MACDONALD'S PLAN.

Quotes Martin Luther in Support of His Project—Petition to the Legislature.

From the New York Morning Advertiser.

E. M. Macdonald, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a journal of Free-thought, proposes to sweep away all of the Sunday laws of the state of New York. A petition to the legislature is being circulated by Mr. Macdonald, requesting the repeal of the law in the interest of religious liberty, and also upon the ground that all illegal restrictions pertaining to Sunday observance are used as instruments of blackmail and of cruel oppression by the police of the cities.

The petitioner also asks that the legislature [liquor traffic is meant] be subject to the same rules on Sunday that it is on other days. Martin Luther is given as the ecclesiastical authority whose views coincide with those of the author of the petition.

A Chicago clergyman having resigned his pastorate in order to devote himself to municipal reform, the St. Paul Call wants to know if there is some thing conflicting between the duties of a Chicago minister and a reformer. Not particularly between the duties of a Chicago minister and those of a reformer, but between the duties of any preacher and the work of a genuine reformer. There is something in the education of the clergyman and the atmosphere which surrounds him in the church that makes it terribly difficult for him to serve his fellow man wisely in "the world." He doesn't know what is needed and the chances are that his sense of fair play is so blunted that in his efforts to reform the world he will do ten times more harm than good.

BRANDYWINE, O., Jan. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.75. Send the ANNUAL and Ingersoll's "All About the Bible," his lectures on Shakspeare, Lincoln, Voltaire, and Suicide.

I received "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" all right; it is the best book of the nineteenth century; I value it higher than any other book I ever read.

SOL BENSON.

Glad to Please the Young.

SCRANTON, PA., Dec. 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I send you herewith $3, renewing my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. I regard the grand old TRUTH SEEKER as a Liberal education in itself and a sure antidote in any family to the miserable superstitions and follies taught by the church. Our little daughter, Mary, is delighted with it.

Very truly yours, GEO. H. MERRITT.

This Paper Like Patent Medicin.

CONCORDIA, KAN., Jan. 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find pay for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER and books. I have been a constant reader of your paper for eight years, and could hardly live without it. I think sometimes it is like patent medicin in one particular, the more you take the more you want. I have at different times in the last year sent you the names of several Liberal-minded persons for sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and whom I have called on since, with a view of getting them to subscribe for the paper, but have had rather hard luck so far. I find they all have received copies and like them very much. I am pretty sure of a few trials at least.

J. L. BOWLING.

Wants Better Evidence.

PAINT ROCK, TENN., Jan. 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: From a recent article in the New York Press it appears that Dr. Elliott Coues, a member of the Society for Psychical Research, has decided—wholly from ex parte statements made to him—that there are such things as ghosts, both of the living and the dead. If this question is to be so decided by the society, or rather by Dr. Coues ex cathedra, why not show that the preponderance of evidence tends the other way? In all of my experience I have found but very few persons who claimed to have seen "ghosts," and in those cases I am entirely satisfied that it was an hallucination or trick of imagination. Show it up.

WM. H. McRAE.

Tastes Better All the Time.

FREEMONT, ILL., Jan. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: My book and the ANNUAL came in good shape. I like the ANNUAL very much. I have read it through, and the more I read the better I like it. "Progress of Science" is fine. John Peck's "A Queer God and His Queer Book" hits the nail hard on the head. I promised you I would sell a half-dozen ANNUALS, and I sold seven. Inclosed find money order therefor.

Can you tell me the address of Mrs. Helen H. Gardener. We named our baby girl Helen H. Gardener Weiser.

FRED C. WEISSER.

[Helen H. Gardener's address is Boston, Mass., care of the Arena, Copley square. —Ed. T. S.]

Paine Honored at Fargo.

FARGO, N. D., Jan. 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Last night there was a Paine memorial and Freethinker's club organized here with fifteen members present. Dr. C. L. McLaren was temporary chairman, and Sam W. Ball temporary secretary. W. A. Ball, in a neat speech, said that the object of the meeting was to commemorate the 158th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, one of the greatest men born in the eighteenth century.

Dr. C. L. McLaren appointed Messrs. W. A. Ball, W. A. Walsh, Col. J. W. Morrow, Dr. C. W. McDorman, and G. G. Walker to read for the period of thirty minutes each, until the lecture of Robert G. Ingersoll on Thomas Paine and the "Age of Reason" was read, which was attentively listened to by the members and visitors present, and after the reading was finished a vote of thanks was tendered to Mr. John Thorne for his generosity in granting the club a room in which to meet.

SAM W. BALL.

A Good Plan—Make a Circuit.

PETERSBURG, IND., Jan. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: We have articles of incorporation recorded thus:

"Know all men, That we, the undersigned citizens of Indiana, associate ourselves together for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a public library, reading-room, and lecture bureau.

"This society shall be composed of resident citizens of the county of Pike, state of Indiana.

"The express purpose of this society is religious, educational, scientific, and benevolent work, which is denominated The Religion of Science.

"The officers shall consist of a president, two vice-presidents, secretary, and treasurer, and shall be chosen annually by the directors at the first regular meeting after the first Monday in January.

"There shall be seven directors, three of whom shall be succeeded by those elected annually by the members of the society on the first Monday in January.

"A majority of directors constitute a quorum to transact business, appoint committees, etc., and shall have power to fill vacancies that may occur in their own body, those so elected to serve until the next annual election.

"Members shall be admitted by a two-thirds vote at any regular meeting, provided, however, there being but seven members present one dissenting vote excludes applicant.

"Yearly membership of responsible persons securing the use of reading matter, subject to rules and by-laws of directorship, may be secured by the payment of an annual fee of twenty-five cents.

"Any change in this fee shall be by unanimous vote at the next meeting, after such proposed change shall have been published.

"The autograph of the president shall constitute the seal of this society."

We shall be glad to hear from some good Freethought organizer whom we could assist in the work. Special inducements to one with a wife or family that would cooperate in the work.

This is a good town, and outside the force of church oppression, quite a pleasant place to live.

Some sort of effort of this kind has to be advanced, or Freethought will perish like "Jonah's gourd," and I think we should secure laborers in local work at least one year at a place to be succeeded by exchanges. If anyone has a better plan, I am willing to help work it.

Sincerely, F. S. WARD.

He Demands Equal Justice.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Jan. 31, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I obtained sixty-four signatures to the Sunday petition. I have sent one to Senator Jacob A. Cantor and the other to H. T. Andrews, of the Assembly, with the following letter to each:

I herewith inclose to you from your constituents a petition against any and all special laws for the protection of Sunday, the so-called Sabbath, such laws being contrary to the spirit and letter of the Constitution of the United States, as:

"Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

"This Constitution and the laws therefrom shall be the supreme laws of the land, and the judges in any state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution and the laws of any state of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding."

New York is a state of the United States and is in duty bound to obey its pledge made on its sacred honor.

We, the people, will fight with all our might for our inherited liberty of freedom of conscience from churchly thralldom.

The clergy have been petted and pampered, given money and privileges; they are freed from paying their just taxes on church property, which makes them insatiable, so overbearing and arrogant, that they believe they can play everybody's keeper and master.

With a very few honorable exceptions, the great majority of the ministers claim to be our teachers, but their teachings are dogmatical and create more hate than love. They do not teach knowledge (science), but superstition, and ought to be classed with the soothsayers. They assume to be the keepers of our morals, while the facts prove that nine-tenths of all defaulters and criminals have been brought up under the influence of their teaching, and it is no wonder, when we contemplate the biographies of King David, of Jacob, and others of their kind, who are claimed by the Bible as the preferred ones, for such examples must of necessity pervert all sense of justice, right, and virtue. These ministers profess to honor God's Sabbath, when they are well aware that their God ordained the seventh day, Saturday, as the Sabbath, and not Sunday. To no men nor synods has ever been given the right or privilege to change God's laws, to set apart another day.

This hypocritical class of men ought to be severely and fearlessly rebuked for their arrogance. The clergy and church people have never complained, and can not, that any person or party ever desired to restrict them in the performance of their devotions, when, where, and as often as they wished to assemble; therefore they ought to be satisfied, and let others, who have the right to differ from them in opinion, enjoy and use life in their own way according to their judgment, so long as others are not injured thereby in their rights—rights, not opinion or belief.

I hope and expect that you will with all your ability and force protect your constituents' rights of personal liberty.

Yours truly, FREDERICK KOEZLY.

A Request for Assistance.

CRANBERRY CENTER, WIS., Dec. 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Parts of Juneau, Monroe, Jackson, and Wood counties, this state, are devoted to the culture of cranberries exclusively. The year 1893 produced good crops to some and very poor ones to others, but none realized hardly any profit since from one-half to two-thirds of the fruit was destroyed by frost and the rest fetched hardly enough to pay harvest expenses. The year 1894 proved to be the most disastrous ever experienced by the growers. The great deficiency in rain and the excessive heat and frosts during spring and summer resulted in a total failure. Station Cranberry Center shipped the past season only about one hundred and fifteen barrels of cranberries, while last year ten thousand barrels were shipped. Besides this total failure most of the marshes have been destroyed by fires, and the owners, who, a few years ago, were well to do people, have not the means to provide for their families; especially will it be hard for them to raise tax-money. Those whose marshes are not burnt too deep, will have to buy vines for replanting if they can obtain the means.

The undersigned would be grateful if some aid could be sent to this part of the country, and would be willing to dispose of same to his best ability.

G. H. KRUSCHKE.

"The undersigned do hereby cheerfully corroborate the above statement as true in every respect, and would say of Mr. G. H. Kruschke, whom the community has known 15 years, that he is a respected and honorable gentleman, well worthy of the trust that might be bestowed upon him by sympathetic donors: J. M. Burch, chairman town of Necedah; W. L. Fuller; Jos. Sowasser, postmaster Necedah; F. Antes Canfield, M.D.; J. D. Butler, clerk circuit court; Fred. Schnell, country treasurer; Chris. Johnson, treasurer-elect; L. P. Lawrence; John Morris, district attorney; T. F. Scanlon, register of deeds; M. S. Parker, county clerk; Demp. Darrow, surveyor; Charles H. Grote, county judge; F. E. Hurd, member of assembly; H. O. Kruschke, pres. W. S. Cran. Grow. Ass'n; J. M. Barlow, chairman county board; J. J. Hughes, pres. F. & M. bank, New Lisbon."

P. S.—Since I wrote the above I had an opportunity to make further inquiry as to the damage which the fire did to the best cranberry district in Wisconsin. The territory burnt extends from Valley Junction to Grand Rapids, a distance of about forty miles, being from a few to several miles in width, which before the fires represented a value of more than $500,000, of which at least 90 per cent is totally destroyed. Land that was worth more than $100 per acre is now offered at $1. Those unfortunate, who lost their cranberry marshes, had no insurance on their lands and, of course, cannot collect a single dollar and are really in a worse condition than those stricken villagers who have been burnt out north of us, who generally carried an insurance which enabled them to rebuild. The want of snow deprived even them of work who might otherwise have found employment in the woods. Contributions will be acknowledged through the leading journals of the state. G. H. KRUSCHKE.

Some Arguments Restated.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Jan. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For some time I have thought of giving a few of my reasons why woman should have access to the ballot. Recently I chanced to pick up a back copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER (Dec. 1), wherein is a letter from Sister HERRISSA M. CRYDER, who proceeds to give the same threadbare arguments that some Liberals have continually used against that progressive step. This is as good a place as any to say that her right to vote has nothing to do with what organizations of a religious character are doing, and to oppose a just cause simply because we are not in the majority, savors very much of the same spirit of intolerance which we attribute to them. That woman is fashion- and creed-bound I am willing to admit; that she has made a success of the church I am equally certain; that she will continue her efforts in that line unless given a broader field, is a self-evident truth. To-day she and man are separated in their efforts; one runs the church, the other politics; they have no incentive to confer except when she, woman-like, asks a favor for the church, which he may or may not grant; and the fact that the church does not get one-tenth of what she demands shows that we have enough broad-minded men to keep her well at bay while thought advances to educate and prepare the masses for truth and justice. Now, put man and woman on an equal footing politically; they will then have an incentive to confer and will on politics; then will that "undercurrent" of Liberalism rise as surely as the sun does; conservatism will be a thing of the past. It would be the imperative duty of every Liberal to stand by his opinions and principles and forsake policy instead of doing as they now do, give $10 to the church where they do $1 to the cause of Liberalism. "Freethought" women were the mothers of this cause. They nurtured it till it became a full-grown child, and was going to live and prosper in spite of the church; then she recognized it. In fact, she has captured it, and now some Liberals wish to retard the child's progress because of its foster parent. They had better learn a lesson of perseverance and self-denial from the untiring proselytism of the church; she has to-day intrenched herself behind a law-protected pulpit where she can collect her chosen few, and expound such portions of the scriptures as are fit to be read in public. It is almost impossible to get a discussion from any divine. Now we want to rout them, and I hope that if from no other source the church will succeed in extending the right of suffrage to woman and start up an agitation. I don't care in what manner, only so it is started.

Let agitation come—who fears? We need a flood, the filth of years Has gathered round us all; roll then on; What cannot stand had best be gone.

And those of a progressive mind who oppose it forget that a kite does not rise with the wind but against it, and that "truth will hold its own against error if left free to combat it," and truth has not as yet been persecuted out of the world. The intelligent and educated may be few, but they are the governing power, and most especially is this true of men. As to the probability of the Prohibition party's success we need have no fears. It is not gaining ground, neither are "nearly all women Prohibitionists." This state gives municipal suffrage to women, and yet notwithstanding our prohibition laws, all towns have not "gone dry" nor been "given over to the churches." But the government of them has been improved; men are careful whom they select for office. As to the East, I was raised there, and I know somewhat of its intolerance and superstition, but I would not hesitate to live in Pennsylvania again with the ballot in the hands of woman. To oppose progress for fear of what may become of it is to acknowledge our own weakness and inability to grapple with existing evil, and the present state of affairs makes hypocrites of fair-minded men. These men oppose her on the ground that equal suffrage means fanaticism in politics. Now I see no difference in fanaticism having a vote and these political schemers truckling to fanaticism, and I am in favor of the fanatic's vote to make honest men of these hypocrites, which means a death blow to fanaticism; the honesty of men will do much to accomplish this end, and when woman is given a broader range of thought, a few lessons outside of her narrow school, she will cease to be a fanatic.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed money for two new subscribers. One of them has been a subscriber for your paper before, but hard times effected him last year so he had to stop the paper. The other is a barber, and I think through him you will get more subscribers, as he generally keeps a paper stand in his shop.

If it is no trouble to you I wish you would answer me this question:

Is there any normal Freethought institution or college in the United States? The reason I ask this is: There is a United Brethren preacher in this town who made his brags a few weeks ago that the Infidels never had any such institution, and some of his flock put that to me. I could not give them a definite answer, but it did seem to me that I had read of such, but I could not remember where. Please send me the ANNUAL.

WALTER HENGARTNER.

[We have no Freethought normal school in the United States, nor any college at present. Stephen Girard left a bequest of more than $2,000,000 for the establishment in Philadelphia of a college for orphan boys. The fund was allowed to accumulate until 1843, when the construction of the buildings was begun and they were completed in 1849. The college is regarded as by far the best specimen of Greek architecture in the United States. Some five hundred boys are accommodated in the institution, which supports and educates them. Mr. Girard provided in his will that no minister or ecclesiastic of any sect or church should ever visit the premises or have any connection with the institution. But the Christians managed to get control of the college in underhand ways and it is now virtually a Christian school, the money of the irreconcilable Freethinker being expended by the very class of superstitionists that he thought he had guarded effectually against. So far, the courts have failed to grant the desired relief.

James Lick left, among his many other contributions to benevolent and educational institutions, $700,000 for an observatory on Mount Hamilton (in connection with the University of California); $10,000 for the Mechanics' Institute of San Francisco, and $450,000 to found the California School of Mechanical Arts. Many other Freethinkers have given generously to education, but one very important consideration seems always to be overlooked by the clerical and other disparagers of the constructively enlightening work of Freethought. It is not taken into account that Freethinkers believe in secular education and that therefore their first anxiety is for the establishment and perfection of schools which will educate all the people, wholly regardless of their beliefs. Education is not denominational, in their scheme of social development; they want the fundamental necessities of the children provided for in the common schools, open to all, and absolutely free from sectarian bias or taint. Then the higher education is to be found in academies, colleges, and universities where parents able to give their children this advanced education may send them in the reasonable hope that they will have the best instruction that can be obtained anywhere, imparted by teachers whose first and only business in the inculcation of the lessons of science, instead of the propping of any creed. Eliminate the foreign element of religious teaching from the common schools and make our institutions of advanced instruction what they should be, purely scientific in purpose and practice, and why should the Freethinker care to establish distinctively Infidel schools? Belief regarding religion is a matter of and for the individual; parents can instruct their children as they think best, and can use the Freethought Sunday-school and lecture room, the Liberal book and newspaper, as efficient aids, just as we tell the creedists to do and keep their dogmas out of the public schools. Every denomination must have its schools where its peculiar doctrines can be taught, for to its adherents those doctrines are the most important things in the world, but Freethinkers, on the contrary, while holding to the vital importance of the Freethought principle, know that the child should be made acquainted with facts first, should be familiar with the basic branches without the knowledge of which no greater acquirement is possible. They realize that a knowledge of the laws of nature and the ability to think clearly and reason in conformity with ascertained facts are the best possible prophylactics against superstition. Hence they are not nearly so anxious to build up distinctively Freethought colleges—which only a comparatively few could attend if they were in existence—as they are to make the schools of the millions really schools of science. In a word, Freethinkers want secular education, and wherever that is given, with no admixture of theological mystification, there is the educational system that is satisfactory to them. Whether we shall own a few Freethought colleges is not nearly so important as that we have such a public school system as that indicated in the following excerpt from the New York Times: "The only thing that will remove the school question from politics is the determination to leave religion to the inculcation of its professed teachers and to make public education exclusively secular, confining it to the teaching of only those things that every child ought to know in order to put himself in the way of becoming an intelligent and self-supporting citizen. As soon as a government gives ear to the pretense that a 'godless' education is worse than none, it will involve itself in trouble. Moreover, as it is applied by the zealots on either side, this pretense is entirely false. There are not two ways, one godless and one godly, of teaching the elements of knowledge to which public instruction ought to be confined. Everybody is agreed that all children ought to be taught reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and grammar. There is no godless and no godly way of teaching these arts. Where they are well taught they are taught in the same way and to the same effect, whether the schoolmaster is an Agnostic or a Jesuit. Anything beyond these rudiments, whether in the form of a higher education or in the form of a religious education, those who desire it for themselves or their children should be left to acquire in their own way and at their own expense."—ED. The Unlicensed Preacher.

GRAND JUNCTION, COL., Jan. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 12th the editor criticizes one of my weekly sermons published in Field and Farm of Denver.

In that sermon I claim that "religion is not a noise, nor a howl, nor singing in the church choir, nor demanding blessings of God, nor a reiteration of pardon from Christ. Religion is a work—a labor of love and charity and mercy among your fellowmen."

In your criticism you deny that love and charity were born of religion. I did not say that they were. I did not say that the religion I had in mind had any God or Christ in it at all. The religion I preach and advocate is entirely of this world—a love of humanity.

But if other men have a religion with a

God and Christ in it, and I can persuade them to add love and mercy and human charity; have I not bettered their religion, and also bettered the world to that extent?

In looking over the world I find that it is almost impossible to wean the human family away from a belief in supernatural gods, and the best thing we can do is to turn this belief into a blessing, rather than to sit down and allow it to be a curse, just because we find it impossible to eradicate these strange faiths from the human mind.

Holding as they do such power over the civilized world, I want to turn the churches in favor of the poor, down-trodden laboring man, and away from the skinfint millionaires, who are fast buying up the religion of Christ and turning it against the struggling poor. I want to make use of man's superstition, and persuade him that, if there is a personal God, this God loves the poor far more than he does the rich.

And Christ did really preach against the rich, and in favor of the poor, and it is my desire to ridicule the Christian world into practicing all that is good in the doctrine of Christ, and drop all that is superstitious and cruel.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is trying to root out the old crooked tree of superstitious religion and has the whole world down on it; and preachers teach their congregations that such a paper is worse than smallpox, and you cannot reach even the people who might be persuaded that human love is better than a love of imaginary gods.

I, on the other hand, climb up the old crooked tree and graft on to its branches the buds of human love and mercy, hoping that when they bear fruit the world will devour it, and become better through eating their fill and finding it is good.

We are working towards the same end—for the bettering of our social and political system—but have taken different means to accomplish the same purpose and need not quarrel over the matter, so long as the world is benefited by our labor.

The inclosed poem will give you an idea of my religious faith. It was published in Pennsylvania Grit, a paper with almost 75,000 weekly circulation, through which medium I have been fighting the modern church for almost ten years, and have won many friends all over the United States.

THE RELIGION OF LOVE.

Have you done some good, my brother,
In this world of want and woe?
Gave assistance to another,
Made a friend, and not a foe?
Did you share food with another,
Doing all the good you can,
For the love of gods, my brother?
Was it for the love of man?

Love of gods is superstition,
Veneration comes to naught,
Faith is but the inanition
Of the soul afraid of thought.
Thought is knowing, thought is feeling,
Thought is power, thought will feed,
Moral cowards think that kneeling
To their gods is all they need.

Look out on the world, my brother,
Where the red blood stains the sods;
Men have murdered one another
In the love and name of gods.
Love of gods is so misleading,
For it blinds the human eyes,
Steels the heart to human pleading,
Stops the ears to human cries.

Our love must be real, brother,
Love the creatures whom we know;
If we love but one another,
Soon the world in love will grow.
Love your sister, love your brother,
Friends and neighbors, is the plan;
Not to gods, but one another,
Should we do the good we can.

You may fear your God, my brother,
Shudder at the thought of death,
But, in helping one another,
You can serve God with each breath,
When you give a glass of water,
And in pity share your crust
With the weary son or daughter,
God will see it, God is just.

But your love is only wasted,
If you force it all on God;
Soul in superstition blasted,
And your faith an iron rod.
You then only call your brothers,
Men who act and think like you,
And your soul will hate all others,
In their blood your hands imbrue.

Love God's poor, and love the lowly,
O my brother, love the poor!
We are dying, slowly, slowly,
Slowly dying, but oh, sure!
And while living, O my brother,
Let us do the good we can,

Not for God, but one another,
Serving God by loving man.

Look out on the world, my brother,
See the lordly, see the slave;
Does the world love one another,
Marching slowly to the grave?
See the blood of martyrs flowing,
Who in God's great name were slain;
Hate and superstition growing
Will produce such blood again.

I have also written letters to THE TRUTH SEEKER during the last five years, but I find I can reach a greater number of bedazzled human creatures through other papers, and draw a salary besides.

I am in literature for a livelihood, just the same as the preachers are, and the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is.

Hoping you will set me "square" before your readers, I am fraternally yours, FARAWAY MOSES.

[The most important preliminary to effectual reform work is clearness of definition. It is a waste of time to take a word which for thousands of years has been in the exclusive service of superstition and make it do good work for Freethought. "Religion," as understood by the masses of mankind, means the service of supernatural beings for the purpose of securing post-earthly rewards and escaping post-earthly punishments. We don't need it; whenever used in the sense in which it was employed by our friend in the paragraph we criticised it serves only to make confusion worse confounded. "Religion" has to do primarily with another world, and when we use it in relation to the affairs of this world, we help becloud instead of clear the mental atmosphere.

"Faraway Moses" says he wants to make use of men's superstitions, and persuade them that "if there is a personal god, this god loves the poor far more than he does the rich." That is presuming on the stupidity of the poor man, and we do not believe it is justified. If we cannot say anything that will brush the cobwebs out of men's brains let us keep still. If there is a personal god he does not love the poor more than he does the rich, unless it is a condition of greater happiness to be poor than to be rich, and in that case all our efforts to abolish poverty are misdirected and, in so far as they are successful, will be productive of misery only. If there is an omnipotent god men are poor because he lets them be poor, because he wishes them to be poor, because he so arranged affairs that they could not be anything but poor. If there is an omnipotent personal god the first work to be done is to reform him, which, of course, would be impossible, and that leaves universal suicide as our only escape from the evils that torment us. The one sufficient answer of the poor man to "Faraway Moses'" statement is, that if there is a personal god he, the poor man, is poor and suffering because this personal god designed him to be so, and this shows that he does not love the poor man as he does the rich man, unless, as said before, it is more desirable to be poor than to be rich, and in that event all the agitation of our labor reformers is a blasphemous interference with the wise plans of this personal god.

As to the teachings of Jesus, we do not at this moment think of any better analysis and exposure of their contradictoriness and impracticability than the very able and exhaustive series of articles in examination of the boasted Sermon on the Mount, which was recently contributed to THE TRUTH SEEKER by Mr. Chas. B. Cooper.

If in helping the poor we are serving "god," how comes it that "god" does not help his own poor? the rational man will ask when he reads our contributor's poem. Each reformer must seek the results he desires, in his own way, but this right does not exempt him from the criticism of those who believe that his way is confusing, expensive, and wholly inadequate to produce logical thinkers, without which progress is impossible.—ED. T. S.]

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Heart Flowers.

Spring hath its blossoms, fair and sweet,
Cowslip and harebell, wet with dew,
Daisies and yellow buttercups,
And dainty violets, white and blue.
So summer brings a wreath of bloom.
Red roses in their green leaves set,
And every zephyr floating near Comes scented with the mignonet.

Autumn, too, makes a royal feast
Of petals, gold and scarlet-hued,
And all the hills and vales around,
With gleaming jewels seem endued.

When winter crowns the passing year
With icy wreath and whitest snow,
Still fairer leaflets ope and spread
Their sweetness on the earth below.

The human heart yieldeth its wealth
Of bloom and glowing beauty rare;
And of its fullest, freest gifts,
All earth-born children take and share.

Oh, fairest of the flowers we note,
Whose fragrance never can depart,
Are those whose tendrils closely cling,
And bloom within the human heart.

Marion Hepburn's Heresy.

It is a sad fact that the world is not yet thoroughly imbued with the spirit of toleration. Though there is no law in this country for the suppression of those who may differ with the believers in the popular religion, and who may openly denounce it as a gross superstition, yet forces are at work that will exclude from the social world the unbeliever or infidel, and take from him, if possible, the proper means of subsistence.

It is lamentable that notwithstanding all the advance which science, art, and literature have made, our civilization has advanced only to this stage—an advance that does not take us very far from the intolerance and barbarism of the Middle Ages. Unquestionably the reason for the existence of this intolerance is to be found in the fact that the mass of the believers in the popular religions have not as yet felt the influences of these grand forces of culture, and that they are unfamiliar with anything outside of the ordinary pursuits and pleasures of life.

Marion Hepburn had bitterly felt this spirit of intolerance when but a young woman, doing the best she knew in making for herself an honest living. Her parents died when but nineteen years of her life had passed, and a few dollars, with their dying wishes for her success in life, constituted her inheritance. Her parents, as many others do, and will continue to do, lived up to their income. Generally, the little dreamed-of happens, that which we least expect; and because many have not made it their business to be their own providence the day of want and misery comes.

Thus, with but a few dollars, Marion Hepburn had to go out into the world to take her place as one of the many who are dependent upon their own ability and energy to earn a living.

What can I do? was the question that perplexed her. Her aunt, with whom she was staying, would not have her sitting idle in her house, as there were now too many mouths to feed and bodies to clothe that could only consume and not produce; and she was anything but pleasant to her orphan niece.

Seated in the large rocking chair, facing the stove which contained a bright fire warming the dining-room, she was meditating over the question—What to do?

"What are you sitting there for?" her aunt asked, as she prepared to pick up the breakfast dishes to carry into the kitchen.

"I was just wondering what I could do. I can't stay here idle any longer. What can I do? Can you tell me? What is the best thing for a girl to do who knows nothing of the outside world, and can only read and write—that is, knows nothing more than a girl just graduated from school. If I could sew, I might do dress-making, but," she reflected, "who would give me dresses to make when I never made one? If I could teach—well, I might be able to procure a position in a school. But, what could I teach? Nothing more than I know, and that is where a school teacher is generally hampered. For some children you cannot know too much, while for others you cannot know too little. If I could play the piano as well as I can write the alphabet, I could take pupils and teach them, but people would say that a young girl like me was not old enough. Is it not awkward sometimes to be young? I think it is and I find it so. I could have had an excellent position a week ago, only the man said, 'You are not old enough—we want a more matured person.' And he would not take me," she innocently went on, "notwithstanding that I told him, if he would give me time, I would get matured like everyone else. I could have done the work. I wish I was doing something! What can I do? Can't you tell me?"

"I don't know myself. You were never taught to do anything, and here lies your trouble. Nobody wants one who can only read and write, and never soiled the fingers by any kind of work."

"No, no one seems to want one who is willing and anxious—who has no one to care for and to advise her. No one wants a girl without any parents, who is almost breaking her heart because she cannot earn her own living, and who sees nothing before her but want and suffering. If I were lying in my grave without a thought of anything, I would be out of my misery. But to struggle and struggle—its awful to go through the world alone without a sympathizing friend, and money gone, and a board bill running up at a relative's house. 'Don't want anyone,' 'You are not experienced,' 'You are not old enough,' and other sentences ring in my ears—as though everyone was born experienced and matured," and tears slowly rolled down her cheeks.

"I've done my best for you. I can't do any more for you," and the aunt left the room.

"Nothing in the papers," she murmured, after glancing over the chief advertisement papers of New York city. "'Experienced,' 'able,' 'with knowledge of this and that,' girls for this trade and for that profession, but nothing for me. I'll look at them again," and picking up one of the papers she began to glance down its columns.

Drawing a Line.

A young Virginian in frocks had been scolded by his grandmother for taking preserves from the dining-room closet without permission. The old lady, with much impressiveness of tone, told the little fellow it was wicked to take things without asking for them, and that although he might have thought there was nobody near him when he took the preserves, God was really watching him and keeping an account of his actions. He said nothing; looked solemn, and later his mother saw him standing near the back porch in an attitude denoting meditation. The household dog, a big Newfoundland, was romping near him. He was not in a mood to play, and walked away from the dog, but the dog followed him. He turned, shook the chubby finger at the dog, and exclaimed, "Go 'way, Jack. It's bad 'nough to had Dod follering me aroun', let alone you."

AMESBURY, MASS., Jan. 22, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: A recent communication to THE TRUTH SEEKER leads me to say that I, too, should be pleased to see a Liberal Young People's Paper. A weekly, at $2 a year, would be the right thing. I will gladly send at least two subscriptions. J. A. WILSON.

VERSAILLES, IND., Jan. 28, 1895.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: After long years of silence I again turn up in the Corner, where so many promising young minds express their opinions freely. The communications from young Free-thinkers are both interesting and profitable to older readers, and one would think you would feel well compensated for the work you are doing in encouraging them to think for themselves and express their thoughts so honestly.

To my mind there is no nobler work than that of training the innocent child to a consciousness of the truth, while, on the other hand, it seems a most reproachful thing to teach it that of the truth of which we ourselves are doubtful.

"Knowledge is power," and the more we learn the more powerful we become. Of course we cannot see the worth of it in dollars and cents, or perhaps gain a livelihood thereby, but for the purchase of good books we have dollars and cents that we would have spent less profitably were it not for this knowledge gleaned while young. We are not so easily duped when we are wise on many points and have learned to think for ourselves.

If any of the young truth seekers would like to learn shorthand, I will be delighted to teach them the Pitman system by mail. Inclosed please find one of my cards (some of my job work) for yourself, Miss Wixon.

With best wishes for yourself and the Cornerites. I am yours for knowledge and mental liberty. ANNIE STOCKINGER.

[Thanks for the above kind letter. We are proud of your attainments and success. Specimens of your work show that you are competent and thorough. Your offer to the readers of the Corner is very kind, and we hope it will be appreciated as it deserves. It is a satisfaction to work for the betterment of young minds. Our heart is in it and with the children always.—ED. C. C.]

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been unthinkingly described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

A SECULAR MARRIAGE AND FUNERAL RITUAL

AND COLLECTION OF SECULAR HYMNS.

By A. R. AYRES.

"A good book written with a purpose."
Price, 25 cents.

Books by SALADIN.

(W. STEWART ROSS).

Editor of the London Agnostic Journal.

GOD AND HIS BOOK.

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold lettered, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

CHRISTIANITY and the SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and Science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals a thinker, observer, and reformer. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. Paper, 10c.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. Paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN AND REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same or more interest than Helen Gardner's story 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" Paper, 25 cents.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—'Where is now thy God?'"

Gems of Thought.

THE ignorant call him a heretic whom they cannot refute.—Tomaso Campanella.

EVERY lover who tries to find in love anything else than love is not a lover.—Paul Bourget.

PEOPLE no longer seriously think that speculative error is bound up with moral iniquity, or that mistaken thinking is either the result or the cause of wicked living.—John Morley.

To be a Christian in any real sense you must start from a dogma of the most tremendous kind, and an undogmatic creed is as senseless as a statue without shape or a picture without color.—Leslie Stephen.

It is often argued that free speech is important only to the heterodox classes. But a menace to one is a menace to all. If justice is right of heart she need not be blindfolded, and may put aside her scales. She will not decide less wisely seeing. If the state were impartial the number and power of its critics would be reduced.—Horace L. Traubel.

CONNECTED with the court of justice was the chamber of torture. The ingenuity of man was exhausted in the construction of instruments that would surely reach the most sensitive nerve. All this was done in the interest of civilization—for the protection of virtue and the well-being of states. Curiously enough, the fact is, that no matter how severe the punishments were, the crimes increased.—Ingersoll.

POSITIVELY criminology must remain a delusion and a snare so long as it ignores the ethical and economic problems which agitate modern society. It is futile to discuss methods of dealing with criminals when the very question of what crime is has never troubled the glib metaphysical criminologists. As a preparation for their task, let the criminologists, professional and amateur, study Spencerian sociology and ethics.—Victor Yarros.

UNLESS this nation is prepared to assume that all religious truth has been attained, it must allow free criticism of popular opinions, even though the majority say such criticisms destroy millions of souls. Unless the nation assumes that it has reached the supreme social and moral perfection it must allow free criticism of social and moral customs; and if such freedom be accepted as right, all its results must be accepted.—Moncure D. Conway.

How far men are at present from that highest moral state, in which the supreme and most powerful sentiments are those called forth by contemplation of conduct itself, and not by contemplation of other persons' opinion of conduct! In the average mind the pain constituted by consciousness of having done something intrinsically wrong, bears but a small ratio to the pain constituted by the consciousness of others' reprobation even though this reprobation is excited by something not intrinsically wrong. How great is the evolution of the moral sentiments yet required to bring human nature into complete fitness for the social state.—Herbert Spencer.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

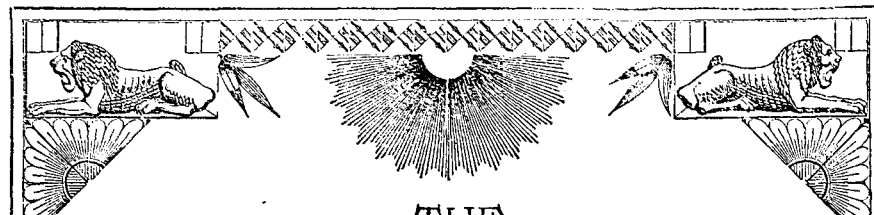

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies,	$1.00
Fifty copies,	4.50
One hundred copies,	8.00

It is significant that all persecution of Whitman comes from the clergy. It was the Rev. James Harlan who deprived the old bard of his clerkship in Washington in 1865, and it was the clergy of New England who drove him from Boston by legal threats in 1882. It was these gelders of literature who castrated Milton's "History of England," caused his "Eikonoklastes" to be burnt by the common hangman, and came alarmingly near depriving the world of "Paradise Lost," it being considered by their donkeyships that the simile of Satan and the rising sun, in the first book, contained treasonable allusion. It is due to these low-browed inquisitors also that the works of John Knox are so hacked up that his real opinion on certain subjects will remain forever unknown.—William Sloane Kennedy.

MANY Christians have been helpful in this world—but helpful from natural promptings, not from supernatural leading. Christianity is a garment. The true Christian wears a heavy, impeding, exhausting robe, while the nominal Christian dons a gossamer suit. Seeing that Christianity has been civilized by the natural man, explained by science, and undermined by the "higher criticism," the day of the gossamer garb itself may reasonably be regarded as drawing to a close. The heavily-robed individual did little or nothing toward ridding the world of slavery, or war, or poverty, or disease, and he distinctly encouraged the subjection of women. When the Christian element was strong, and the natural element weak, he fought against education, inquiry, and science; he gave comparatively no thought to hospitals and asylums; he still frowns on libraries, picture galleries, parks, and Sunday freedom. Fortunately, the gossamer garment puts but slight check on the goodness of the natural man; nay, it positively imprisons the heavy garment for intrusting its dying child to elders, oil, and prayer.—Furneaux Jordan.

THE authorities up in Springfield have intercepted a package sent thither from China. It was ostensibly a book, but on being opened it was found that the leaves had been cut out and a gorgeous silk handkerchief, of duitable value, was smuggled therein. The sad thing about it is that it was sent by a converted Oriental to a Springfield missionary!—Boston Herald.

DASHAWAY: "You believe in the efficacy of prayer, uncle. But suppose a chicken from your neighbor's yard should hop by your door and you should get down on your knees and pray for that chicken to enter, do you think your prayer would be answered?" Uncle Ebony: "I mos' sartainly do, sah. But in dat case, sah, I should sprinkle a few grains of co'n on the s ep."—Life.

DR. GRANBERY and family are Presbyterians. In the family is a baby boy of two years. Mrs. G. had been drilling the boy in the Shorter Catechism. Young two-year-old, becoming unmanageable in the absence of his father, had been subjected to a mild application of the rod. When the doctor returned, and noticed the boy was in trouble, the following conversation took place: Father: "What is the matter, my son?" Son (weeping): "Mother whipped me." Father: "What for, my boy?" Son (sobbing): "For her own glory."

"HERE, Benny," said Mr. Bloobumper to his young son, as the latter started to church, "are a five-cent piece and a quarter. You can put which you please into the contribution box." Benny thanked his papa and went to church. Curious to know which coin Benny had given, his papa asked him when he returned, and Benny replied: "Well, papa, it was this way. The preacher said the Lord loved a cheerful giver, and I knew I could give a nickel a good deal more cheerfully than I could give a quarter, so I put the nickel in."—Harper's Bazar.

A RUSTIC recently went to church where a mission sermon was being preached from the text, "Peter's wife's mother lay sick of a fever." In the afternoon he went to church in an adjacent parish, and there saw the same mission preacher, who again took for his text, "Peter's wife's mother

Scarcely had he seated himself in the train when a gentleman, whom he recognized as the preacher, asked him if he could tell him who the bell was tolling for? Deafness Cannot Be Cured by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a running sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces. We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars free. F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE
Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equalled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

SOME INSPIRATION.

News of the Week.

It is reported from Hawaii that the deposed queen, Liliuokalani, has abdicated.

The family of John Bock, six in number, was burned to death at Omer, Mich., on Feb. 6.

THERE have been 30,000 deaths from grip in the state of New York since and including 1889.

FIRE caused an explosion of fire-damp at Montceau-les-Mines, France, and fifty lives were lost.

The morning of Feb. 7 was the coldest in New York in fourteen years, the mercury being 8 below zero.

A TROLLEY car at Milwaukee plunged through an open draw and the motorman and two passengers were drowned.

The last of the Chinese defenses at Wei-Hai-Wei have been taken and the vessels of the Chinese fleet sunk or captured.

THEODORE D. WELD, the famous abolitionist, died at his home at Hyde Park, Mass., on Feb. 4, aged ninety-one years.

The failure of the Norfolk and Western Railroad adds 1,566 miles of road to the 7,025 miles last year placed in the hands of receivers.

The steamer Cienfuegos of the Ward line was wrecked on a reef near one of the Bahamas last week. The passengers, crew, and mails were taken off safely.

The steamship Amerique was wrecked on the Caribbean coast. The passengers and all the crew but one were saved. Cargo, baggage, and mails were lost.

A STRONG movement is on foot to wipe out the color line established by the League of American Wheelmen a year or so ago at the behest of the Southern members.

The Springer bond bill and the Reed substitute were both defeated in the House on Feb. 7, the former by a vote of 162 to 135 and the latter by a still more decisive vote.

MASSACHUSETTS Spiritualists and others are working for the repeal of the restrictive features of the Massachusetts medical law. A grand rally was held in Berkeley Hall, Boston, on Feb. 10.

A NEW act passed by the Spanish cortes places American products imported into Cuba and Porto Rico in the second column of the tariff schedule, thus insuring fairer trade with those Islands.

The Brooklyn trolley strike has not yet come to an end, officially, and sporadic cases of violence are still frequent. The storm tied up the lines even more tightly than the strike and resulting violence had done.

New York banks having extended the refunding warrants of South Dakota one year that state will pass with unimpaired credit through the financial difficulty precipitated by the dishonesty of one of her officials.

UNDER peremptory instructions of Judge Barr at Owensboro, Ky., the jury in a test case under the separate coach law brought in a verdict against the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Co., assessing the damages at one cent, and adding costs.

A BILL has been introduced in the New York legislature to create a news stand trust in this city, the offer being made to the city to guarantee to it three per cent on the gross receipts. This is intended to silence opposition. The bill is a perennial one.

THE Brooklyn Board of Aldermen having voted to annul the licenses of certain of the trolley companies on petition of the strikers and their sympathizers, Mayor Schieren vetoed their action on the ground that they lacked authority to rescind such licenses.

FOR years there has been a boundary dispute between Brazil and the Argentine Republic. The territory is about as large as the state of Maryland, and lies between the states of Parana and Rio Grand do Sul. President Cleveland, as arbitrator, has just decided that the land belongs to Brazil.

THE Senate, by a vote of 36 to 25, has appropriated $500,000 for beginning work on a cable to Hawaii. The affirmative vote was made up of 27 Reps., 6 Dems., and 3 Populists; the negative of one Rep. (Pettigrew) and 24 Dems. The absent Pops. and Reps. were all paired in favor of the measure.

ON Sunday, Feb. 3, the New York police raided the billiard rooms of Marcus Daly and George Slosson and took a large number of the attendants and players to the police stations, where they were promptly bailed out by the proprietors of the places raided. These billiard halls are eminently respectable and have been open for many years on Sunday. The outrage places the Sunday law in still greater peril.

MUCH anxiety was felt for the French liner La Gascogne until late Monday afternoon. She was then eight days overdue, having been sixteen days out from Havre. The cause of the delay was a broken piston rod, the accident occurring on Jan. 29. She lay to sixteen hours for repairs and then proceeded slowly under half-steam. Feb. 5 she ran into terrible gales and lay to off Sable Island for forty-one hours. After that she could make but 100 miles per day. Did not see a single ship during the entire trip until Sunday, Feb. 10.

A GREAT storm accompanied with intense cold swept over more than half of the country last week. It extended from the Rocky Mountains to the Atlantic and far out to sea, and from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. The area covered was four times greater than that by the blizzard of '88 and the temperature much lower, but the snowfall was decidedly lighter. Only the lower point of Florida and the southern portion of the Pacific Coast was above freezing. The wind record was 60 miles at New York on Feb. 8, and 80 outside Sandy Hook. In the South the damage done to the crops is almost immeasurable. Not only to the crops, but to the trees. The orange groves of Florida are well-high ruined, as are the pineapple trees. Much damage was done to shipping all along the Atlantic coast, many small vessels being lost, while some of the big liners are long overdue and great anxiety is felt for their safety. The Umbria picked up the crew of one fishing smack and the Teutonic rescued the crew of a French trader. Sailors bound in the rigging of their foundered and beached vessels were frozen to death, and those saved after forty hours of intense suffering will be crippled for life. Many buildings were swept away by tidal waves at Halifax, Cape Breton, New Haven, and other points. Travel and transportation all over the district affected by the storm was almost at a standstill. Suburban travel was also nearly stopped in very many cities. New York's harbor was nearly closed by ice, as were other harbors. There was intense suffering among the poor and among those whose vocations took them out into the storm. Steam pipes on cars were frozen up and the cars turned into refrigerators. The cold is very severe also in England and on the Continent.

Something
QUITE NEW & UNIQUE
THE
BETTER WORLD.
A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE
By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Bible and Evolution.

The manner is good, and the style is bright. The reader is carried along on an easy-flowing stream of science, history, ethics, and common-sense."

Work That Should Be Done at Once.

We have sent out gratuitously several thousand copies of the pamphlet, "Church Property," by far the greater portion of them at our own expense. We should distribute at once at least two thousand copies more, for there are five states in which the question of the taxation of church property is engaging the attention of the legislature. Among these states are Wisconsin and Colorado, in which there is a good fighting chance for victory if the battle is conducted as it could be conducted were there plenty of the sinews of war at the disposal of the champions of equal justice. Then there are Arizona and Utah, the first of which will probably be soon invested with statehood, and the other of which is about to prepare her state constitution. It is of vital importance that the foundations of these young states be laid in the granite and concrete of sound principles, and to this end we are anxious to put into the hands of the editors in the embryo states and of the delegates to the constitutional conventions not only "Church Property" but anti-Sabbatarian literature and documents embodying and defending the other secular demands. A new edition of "Church Property" will be gotten out immediately if the friends of the cause come promptly to the front with contributions to help defray the expenses. We will do all that we can, but this fight is yours as well as ours, and all should join hands to do the work that must be done if this country is to be freed and kept free from the curse of church rule.

It will soon be time to place again before the people the facts regarding the persecution of Mr. J. B. Wise, of Kansas, who is now under bonds awaiting trial for the heinous crime of sending through the mails a postal card upon which he had written a passage from the Bible. This card was sent to a minister with whom Mr. Wise had been discussing theological questions, with the request that the ambassador of heaven and interpreter of God's word explain the meaning of this passage and tell why it is in the "Holy Bible." Mr. Wise must be defended in court and the public be made acquainted with the causes that led to his arraignment as a felon at the bar of the federal tribunal; he must not be imprisoned, if we can prevent it, nor made to suffer in reputation because the machinery of an unjust law has been set in motion by hypocrites to crush him and to terrorize others who venture to criticize the fetish of the church. But the suit cannot be defended without money, and again we ask you to lend the hand of ready help. Mr. Wise is poor; with his one arm he can make only a bare living for himself, but he represents us all.

Another good Liberal who imperatively needs the assistance of his fellow Freethinkers is Mr. S. J. Fleckten, of Kandayohi, Minn., who, as you are aware, has determined that his children shall not longer be forced to take part in religious exercises in the school to which he must send them and which is maintained with money raised by the taxation of all the people, irrespective of religious beliefs. He stands bravely alone in his district in demanding that the Bible and prayers and hymns be banished from the school room and that the school be conducted as the constitution of the state commands. A test case should be taken to the highest court in Minnesota. Mr. Fleckten has not the means to do this, and we should not think of asking it of him, for we are just as much interested in the matter as he is, and we ought not to need the least bit of urging to create a fund for the purpose indicated. The first Minnesotan to respond to the call for ammunition in this case is Mr. H. Schmidt, of Owatonna, who pledges $3. John E. Fleckten, V. A. Fleckten, and Aug. Bitzen, of Lake Lillian, Minn., put down their names for $1 each. Other sums were credited in THE TRUTH SEEKER last week, in the Letters of Friends, and we hope that very much more will be forthcoming in the immediate future.

In this state the agitation for the repeal of the Sunday law is being kept up with all the instrumentalities at our command. We have sent our petition to all the daily papers of this city, and have written personal letters to the editors in behalf of repeal; our "Open Letter to the Legislators of New York" has been mailed to all the Senators and Assemblymen and to a large number of papers throughout the state, and if we had the wherewithal a good man would go to Albany to present our demands to the proper committee of the legislature. Hearings have been given on proposed amendments to the Excise law, but no one has voiced the clear-cut and unequivocal principles of the Freethinkers. We are not trying to secure special privileges for a class or a business; we ask, on the contrary, that all special privileges be swept away. It is not to give Sunday to the saloonists that we would take it from the preachers—let all the people have it and use it as they wish for their own profit and pleasure. New York should be sown wide with the literature of Sunday freedom; every citizen should have the opportunity to read the Freethinker's unanswerable arguments for liberty and equity. Help us redeem the Empire state from the clutch of the priest. It takes money to print and distribute papers and pamphlets, to defend unjustly persecuted men, to carry on suits at law. Will each of you contribute a little?

"Thomas Paine in a New Light."

Such is the title of a lecture delivered in the Grand Opera House, Chicago, Feb. 11, 1894, by Rev. M. M. Mangasarian. It is in spirit fair to Paine, but Mr. Mangasarian has not always understood the author of the "Age of Reason," and he certainly has not that sense of perspective and proportion which all critics of the early Freethought writers should possess if they are to do justice to the men of whom they write and to their own good intentions. Neither does the Ethical lecturer understand the Freethinkers of to-day, as will appear when we come to quote from him.

We are informed that "poor Thomas Paine" had the sad fortune to be made the battleground of two forces, "blind and blighting," fanaticism and Atheism.

"The superstitious and hypocritical devotees of the altar pictured him as a demon in human form. The equally superstitious Secularists and Freethinkers hailed him as an Atheist."

What is Mr. Mangasarian's authority for the latter assertion? Who are the representative Freethinkers who have called Thomas Paine an Atheist? Does not the lecturer know that both Paine and Voltaire have been branded as Atheists by the Christian clergy through all the years that have intervened between the time when they wrote and the present day, and that Freethinkers have been as persistently busy in disproving the unfounded assertions of the ministers and their echoes? There is much Christian literature still in circulation, some of it written very recently, which retails the mouldy falsehood that both the great Frenchman and the great English-American were Atheists, but we, with far better opportunities than Mr. Mangasarian to know what Freethinkers say, have but once known Paine to be called an Atheist by a Freethinker, and the man who so designated him had read very little on the subject of Infidelity.

Several of Paine's Theistic declarations are quoted, and then Mr. Mangasarian says: "The author of these words could have nothing in common with the Atheists and Secularists of our time." The gentleman generalizes too hastily and widely—it by no means follows because Paine was a Deist, while a very large proportion of modern Freethinkers are Atheists or Agnostics, that there is no broad ground upon which they could stand together were Paine living to-day, and of the way of thinking that he was when he wrote the "Age of Reason." He and they would agree that the Bible is a human production instead of being a revelation from God, and that Jesus—if such a person ever lived—came into existence in the manner that all other individuals of the genus homo do. These, surely, are two very important points of agreement. Then Paine believed in the total separation of church and state, and this would have aligned him with the nineteenth century Freethinkers, for it forms a bond of union between the otherwise incongruous divisions of the Materialists and Spiritualists and holds together Atheists, Agnostics, and Theists. Paine believed in free speech, free press, the rights of woman, the solidarity of humanity, equality before the law, and in all these he would have found himself at home with the Freethinkers of this age.

"Thomas Paine, by the violence of his method, the coarseness of some of his phrases, and by his slovenly scholarship, has also done great harm to the cause of true progress. . . . He was more vehement than deep. He possessed more force than light. He was sounder and stronger than the priests he attacked, but not better. He was an antagonist, not a philosopher. We look in vain for the 'sweet reasonableness' which so well becomes the sage. His style is not free from the corroding dross and clay of passion. His words are not chaste, as the words of a reformer should be. In religion, as in politics, violence is disastrous. Ridicule and contempt are shallow. A scoffer is rarely profound. Doubt and denial may kill the disease, but they can't save the patient. It is sympathy that sees. We learn to understand only when we learn to love."

These objections may give the impression of weight and force, but they are perceived to be light and ineffectiv when the reader takes into account the relation of Paine to his environment and the results that his labors have accomplished. Thomas Paine was a MAN, and he fought as men fight, with the naked blade of Toledo steel, not with a sword of lath in a scabbard of velvet. He and such as he have made it possible for the Mangasarians to express their apologetic doubts in scholarly language and to cultivate the amenities of heretical discussion without incurring the risk of being chained to the filthy floors of the church's subterranean dungeons, or trying logical conclusions with the rack and iron boot. If Paine was violent, it was the violence of just indignation against imposture, persecution, rapine, rape, and murder; if some of his phrases were coarse, judged by the standards of to-day, they were not so judged by the literary canons of his time, and they had the great merit of being understandable by the common people for whom he wrote; if his scholarship was "slovenly," measured by the results of a critical research that for decades has delved in vast literary, historical, and archeological accumulations that were either unknown or inaccessible to Paine and his contemporaries, the offense may well be forgiven him in view of the fact that despite that "slovenliness" he succeeded in producing, under great difficulties and in circumstances of appalling danger, a work to which the best theologians of the church have not yet found a more conclusiv answer than slander of its dead author.

An apostle of ethical culture should not have said that, while Paine was sounder and stronger than the priests he attacked, he was not better. Of ordinary men, who express themselves in their daily lives rather than in public teachings, it is well to say that they are "bad" or "good" according as they are addicted to or abstain from the personal vices which Paine's enemies—entirely without cause—charged against him; but when we are called upon to sum up the worth of those who stand in the relation of teachers to their fellow-men we are bound by no such petty rule. One instructor is better than other instructors if the principles he inculcates are more just than those which they uphold. Veracious historians inform us that many of the most cruel persecutors and ruthless destroyers of the people have been men and women of irreproachable private character. What good did they do by being "better" than others? Of what avail were their "virtue," and "purity," and "probity"? Because of the falsity and heartlessness of their teachings and their public actions their private "goodness" produced almost infinit harm. Pointed to as models of morality, they necessarily and inevitably became exemplars of intolerance, fiendish torture, and wholesale slaughter. Had they in private life been utterly degraded they would not have been able to cause a tenth part of the suffering that resulted from their teachings and from their government of the world. Their crimes found imitators; their personal virtues did not. Paine was better than the priests he attacked because there was in his teachings the potentiality of liberty and its child, justice. He denounced the tyranny of kings, he exposed the superstitions of priests, he showed the foolishness of blind faith, he pleaded for the rights of woman, he condemned chattel slavery, he refused to treat with intolerance and persecution, he advocated the equal political rights of the whole people, he risked his own life to save the life of a man from whose hand he had helped to wrest the scepter of authority, and in his conduct he was faithful to the sublime principles which he taught. In all this he was better than the priests whom he antagonized. He wrote for freedom and equity, and in his life was loyal to them. This cannot truthfully be said for any priesthood, least of all the priesthood that Thomas Paine weighed and found wanting. Were it not for the calumnies of his Christian detractors, little would be asked concerning his personal affairs, but millions have been instructed by his writings, infused with his love of liberty, and ennobled by his passionate devotion to her service.

Paine's time demanded antagonists as well as philosophers, as all times do, and it would be no discredit to the author of the "Rights of Man" had he been more antagonistic than he was and less philosopher than his works prove him to have been, but he was philosopher enough to accept from others or to formulate for himself the principles which are to-day the sheet anchor of hope for the nations of the earth. And he had the virile manhood to enter the lists and do valiant and successful battle for what he held to be true and right. There is no particular call for "sweet reasonableness" when protesting against the persecution of men for opinion's sake, or denouncing the religious system which requires us to say that we believe that a being of infinit mercy and justice ordered the horrible slaughter of the Amalekites and Midianites. It would not be strange if there were some of "the dross and clay of passion" in the style of one who labored to uproot a creed which teaches that for the mistake of an ignorant savage uncountable quintillions of his innocent descendants will burn forever in the fires of hell. Physical violence is indeed often disastrous, but moral earnestness is not necessarily violence, and oftentimes men's emotion must be aroused as well as their intellects enlightened. Ridicule and contempt may be shallow, but since Voltaire did his mighty work in France really thoughtful Freethinkers have been very chary in their condemnation of ridicule as a weapon against credulity, bigotry, and cruelty. It has its place, and an important place, in the propaganda of Liberalism. It may be true that the scoffer is "rarely profound," but Mr. Mangasarian should not forget that while both Voltaire and Paine were scoffers, as he defines the scoffer, they were also both eager, as he is, to maintain the existence of a god. If doubt and denial do kill the disease, common sense would be tempted to say that the patient is saved. It would seem to be self-evident that doubt and denial must rest on an affirmation, an affirmation which takes the place of the assumed affirmation doubted or denied.

Yes, "it is sympathy that sees," and Paine sympathized with the agonized victims of priests and kings, and sympathizing he was enabled to see much of the truth concerning human relations. He had learned to love his fellows and hence he understood their needs, but he never learned to love tyranny, and therefore he never learned to understand why it should be accepted as an abiding principle and practice. He hated the tyrannical act, but he did not hate the tyrant, as a man, for he realized that he also was the victim of circumstances, and so from motives both of political policy and of mercy he voted against the death of Louis. Judged by Mr. Mangasarian's own tests the doubter and denier Paine could save the patient as well as kill the disease. But he was overborne by the believers.

Great Reductions in Standard Freethought Works.

The popularity of our missionary scheme, by which Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is being scattered broadcast by the thousands, has induced us to lower the price of his other works, with the hope that they too will have a wider reading. From this date the prices of Paine's books will be as follows:

AGE OF REASON. Paper, 25 cents. Eight copies sent to as many different addresses for $1. Cloth, 50 cents.

EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Paper, 15 cents.

COMMON SENSE. The argument that did more than any other to convince the Revolutionary leaders of the necessity of the separation of this country from Great Britain. Paper, 15 cents.

THE CRISIS. Paine's great Revolutionary writings. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Answer to Burke's attack on the French Revolution. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PAINE'S GREAT WORKS IN ONE VOLUME. 8vo., 800 pp., cloth, $3, leather $4, morocco, gilt edges, $4.50. This book and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $5.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. One volume containing Common Sense, Crisis, and Rights of Man. Cloth, $1.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. One volume containing Age of Reason, Examination of the Prophecies, Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff, Essay on Dreams, Letters, etc. With Life of Paine and steel portrait. Cloth, $1.

We trust all our readers will do their best to scatter these splendid works all over the country.

We hope that all our friends will make a determined effort to fill at least once that trial subscription blank on page 114. THE TRUTH SEEKER is sent for three months on trial for the small sum of fifty cents. This offer gives an excellent opportunity to introduce the paper into tens of thousands of homes and offices where Freethought literature has not often penetrated, if ever. Will you send us such a list?

The World suggests that "the blue-law police judges who fine the keepers of billiard-rooms for breaking the Sabbath are merely playing at Puritanism. They are not as blue as they pretend to be, or as they will be when they come in range of the boot-toe of nineteenth-century public opinion." The long immunity of the Sabbath fanatics makes us just a little apprehensive that communication between the brain of civilization and the "boot-toe of nineteenth century public opinion" has been cut.

There is a clergyman in Washington who is trying to imitate the English style of advertisement, where tradesmen announce that they are "costermongers to her Majesty," or "cane-makers to his Highness the Prince of Wales." Rev. Adolas Allen sent a letter to Senator Call in regard to the lottery bill, and the Senator had it printed in the Record. The letter closed in these words:

"Go on, sir, and the Lord will bless you in your effort.
Respectfully,
ADOLAS ALLEN,
Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, attended by the President and Mrs. Cleveland."

Will we be deemed uncharitable if we suggest that it is possible that "Adolas" and "adolescent" spring from the same root?

This time it is a preacher who has fallen into the meshes of the postal law. Rev. Frank L. Chardon of the Presbyterian church at Leroy, Ill., was in the habit of procuring annual, round-trip, and single-trip passes from all the railroads that he could work, and then, as L. A. Carpenter, offering them to the ticket brokers. In this industry he came under the observation of the postal authorities, and on Jan. 29 Inspector Stuart arrested him in Chicago. In his circular to brokers he said:

"There is no cheaper way to get rates, and you can make $400 in twelve months, or double that on one P. If you bid $50 it secures the P. First come first served. Send in your bids."

The letters were dated from Chicago, Columbus, Kansas City, Leroy, and other points. But to prevent fraud of this kind there is no necessity for meddling with the mails, and fraud is not one of the crimes which the federal government can constitutionally ferret out and punish.

We are pleased to see that there are now appearing in the newspapers a considerable number of letters which give evidence that their writers are acquainted with the bed-rock principles of human justice. One in the Herald of this city, dated at Knoxville, Tenn., is a tersely-written, straightforward, and conclusiv argument for the total divorcement of church and state, including the abrogation of all Sabbath laws. Another, in the World of Feb. 15, pleads for rational divorce as against the ecclesiastical no-divorce-except-for-adultery system. The writer says that the question of divorce is no longer abstract or theoretical; it is the practical one of justice between husbands and wives. If all Free-thinkers would make a point of writing to the newspapers when they see the need for vindicating the principles of liberty and justice, which are our principles, Freethought would soon be respected far more than it now is, and, consequently, its influence for good would be vastly augmented.

The police of New York are busy these days in arresting the violators of our Puritan Sunday laws. Among the fiendish criminals brought in on Sunday, Feb. 10, was one man who sold meat, another who sold a linen collar, and two others who sold earmuffs to policemen. Touching these last the World sarcastically observes: "Now that the government of the great state of New York has brought its power to bear for the punishment of a wretch who was detected in the heinous crime of selling earmuffs on Sunday, with the thermometer at zero, word ought to be got to Cotton Mather that the millennium is coming at last in what was once Stuyvesant's ungodly village." Several more billiard rooms have been raided, and Mr. Slosson, of whose arrest we told last week, was fined ten dollars. Evidently the justices are not very much in sympathy with the contemptible crusade or the law which alone makes the persecution possible. But the city is under the feet of the preachers and the societies of offensively Christian women, who make a noise in inverse ratio to their numbers as compared with the numbers of the people who want the miserable Sunday laws repealed or greatly modified, and so it is a very difficult task to make any impression on the rural legislators at Albany, who are still more under the clerical and Christian women influence than are our city officials.

Our friend E. O. Roscoe, of Brooklyn, sends us a letter written by the assemblyman from his district in reply to one of Mr. Roscoe's, in which the representative of Queens (Eugene B. Vacheron) says:

"Yours of the 13th inst. duly received and contents noted, and I may add that I fully concur with you in the matter of all restrictions being abolished relative to the first day of the week, and my vote will be so recorded if I have that opportunity."

This is good, and we hope that other readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will follow the example of Mr. Roscoe and get their Assemblymen and Senators to declare their position. A few determined and well-posted champions of the Free Sunday can do a great deal in the legislature. What is first wanted in every reform is an intelligent and fearless leader. Let us hope that Mr. Vacheron is the right man in the right place. Since our last acknowledgment we have received for the Sunday law fight the sums specified here: W. T. Galloway, 50 cents; Eliza W. Haines, $1.25; W. F. Davis, $1; W. H. H. Stebbins, $1; Charles Wolsfeld, $1. We hope that after our readers have carefully considered the statements made on the first editorial page this week they will come to our assistance still more freely and generously. There is very much to do and it cannot be done without the means to pay expenses. In addition to the sums acknowledged elsewhere we have received for the Fleckten contest in Minnesota $1 from Erwin Auffurth and $1 from Eliza W. Haines.

Among the superfluous inhabitants of this city is a Miss Rebecca Fream, who lives over on the East side and makes herself an intolerable nuisance to the poor people of that district who find themselves under the necessity of trying to add a little to their scanty revenues by pursuing their humble vocations on the first day of the week, otherwise known as the priest's collection day. She also torments the boys who play marbles and craps in the streets. Every Sunday she is out on her meddling mission, frightening the push cart peddlers here, grabbing the stakes of the boys there, and securing the arrest of the small shop keepers in some other place. She is never happy except when she is making better people miserable. Occasionally some of her victims snowball her, but she is impervious to all argument, even that of her own kind, physical force. It seems to be impossible to teach her good manners—she is so constituted that she is wholly unresponsive thereto. Last Sunday, after playing the organ at St. George's Mission, she came out and had one poor man locked up for selling socks from a push-cart, another for selling furniture in his store, and a woman for supplying her customers with chickens. When justice is thus made the plaything of such small-caliber creatures it is very certain that Americans have very little of which they can rightly be proud, for it must not be forgotten that the Rebecca Freams would be as harmless as the other fossils which lie on the museum shelves if it were not for the law in whose shelter they carry on their thieving of the people's time, property, and liberty. The shame of it all is New York's and America's. Down with the infamous Sunday laws.

The Freethought Letter Writing Corps will this week write to the New York Press. That paper, replying in a recent issue to a correspondent, says that while the inculcation of morality was not entirely lacking in the religions of India and China, Greece and Rome, "Christianity, however, surpasses them all, for, unlike these ancient faiths, its keynote was not self-righteousness, but helpfulness to others. It taught that the highest religion consisted in the service of humanity." How it taught the beauty of help to others and of service to humanity is illustrated in these resolutions adopted in 1860 by the American Presbyterian Assembly:

"To the Church of Christ throughout the world slavery is no new thing. It has not only existed for ages in the world, but it has existed under every dispensation of the covenant of grace in the church of God. Indeed, the first organization of the church as a visible society, separate and distinct from the unbelieving world, was inaugurated in the family of a slaveholder. Slavery again reappears under the law. God sanctions it in the first table of the Decalogue, and Moses treats it as an institution to be regulated, not abolished; legitimated, not condemned. We come down to the New Testament, and we find it again in the churches founded by the Apostles under the plenary inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

"Moses and the Apostles alike sanctioned slavery. We cannot prosecute the argument in detail, but we have said enough, we think, to vindicate the position of the church. We have assumed no new attitude. We stand where the Church of God always has stood, from Abraham to Moses, from Moses to Christ, from Christ to the Reformers, and from the Reformers to ourselves. We stand upon the foundation of the prophets and the apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the corner stone. Shall the finger of scorn be pointed at us and our names be cast out as evil, because we utterly refuse to break communion with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, with Moses, David and Isaiah, with apostles and prophets and martyrs, with all the noble army of confessors who have gone to glory from a slaveholding country and a slaveholding church?"

Many other ways in which Christianity revealed its love for humanity will readily suggest themselves to the intelligent members of the Corps.

The Methodist Preachers' Association recently adopted resolutions and presented them to Mayor Strong, declaring that

"The legalizing of the liquor traffic on any part of the Lord's day, either by a direct vote of the legislature or by giving the large cities an option so to do by a majority vote, would be a violation of the laws of God and of the principles and statutes which have marked our nation's history, and that such course would bring untold evils upon the city, the state, and the nation."

Upon this the Evening Post pertinently remarks that the "great principle which has marked our nation's history" is the principle that the majority shall rule, and that therefore the contention of the ministers that to give the cities "an option by a majority vote" to determine in what way they shall be governed would be a flagrant outrage, is absurd. The paper continues: "The absurdity of their position can be made clear even to them by turning the case around. Suppose that a state law to-day authorized open saloons on Sunday, that a majority wanted to close them, and that the legislature refused to give them an option so to do by a majority vote." What an outrage the Methodist Preachers' Association would consider such a denial of the right of the majority to rule! But it is just as great an outrage to deny this fundamental right of the majority when the majority is on the other side." The current is setting in the direction of the self-government of cities in so far as the liquor traffic on Sunday is concerned. But this is only a makeshift; we demand that all forms of business and recreation be as free from priestly trammels on Sunday as on other days. To the extent that local autonomy will help attain this very much needed end, well and good, but it must not be forgotten that the individual has certain reserved rights that no majority, local, state, or national, can trample upon with impunity. Among these is the inalienable right to make such use of Sunday as he sees fit, always provided (logical minds do not require this last clause) that he invades not the like freedom of others.

The Independent says that our cartoons often express far more than they were intended to do. Of one of the latest, representing the mastiff of Freethought guarding the entrance to the Temple of Liberty, in which sits the goddess holding the shield of the Constitution, while without, kept at bay by Freethought, are such "smaller specimens of the same species" as the W. C. T. U., the National Reform Association, the Sabbath Union, and Catholicism, it observes:

"The real lesson is, if Freethought were predominant, there would be no toleration for the church, or temperance, or Sabbath, or other reforms. In other words, 'Freethought' is not free thought at all, not a noble mastiff, but is of the genus Lupus. There is no freer thought in the world than Christian thought, and there is no liberty so broad and comprehensive as that which obtains in Christian nations. It allows the same freedom to unbelief as to belief, while aggressive unbelief would play the dog in the manger."

The Independent well knows that the meaning of the cartoon was that the principle of Freethought, the affirmation of the rightfulness of the separation of state and church, is all that stands between the various reactionary forces of the Christian church and the Constitution of the nation, which those reactionary forces are striving to rend and destroy. It knows that we would leave the church absolutely free to continue her work of evangelization, but that we demand that she shall prosecute that work at her own cost, and it itself agrees with us, so far as the taxation of church property is concerned. It knows that we would not place the slightest obstruction in the way of temperance, but that we earnestly protest against the prostitution of the cause of temperance for the benefit of the church and the strengthening of invasive Sabbatarianism. It knows that we would interfere with no man who chooses to abstain from labor and participation in amusements on Sunday, but that we demand the opportunity for every inhabitant of the state to choose his own time for work and recreation, subject only to the conditions which the concessions made freely by himself and his fellows for convenience' sake impose upon him and them. It knows that it is not true that "there is no freer thought in the world than Christian thought," for it knows that the Christian is afraid to think freely for fear of his god and the devil and hell. That is, the real Christian—we are not talking of the multitudes of rationalists who call themselves Christians for various reasons, the most of which reasons are not creditable to them as men and women. It knows that it is not true that "there is no liberty so broad and comprehensive as that which obtains in Christian nations," for it knows that in the ratio that a nation is actually Christian it is narrow and exclusive, and that the same was true as regards the Christian nations of past ages. It knows that Christianity does not, when it possesses the power to deny it, allow "the same freedom to unbelief as to belief." And finally, it knows that there is no evidence that "aggressive unbelief would play the dog-in-the-manger," for there is scarcely a trace of aggressive unbelief, in the sense that it would aggress upon the equal rights of the Christian. Practically all unbelievers demand only that the believer in supernaturalism shall cease to enjoy special privileges.

THE Fellowship for Ethical Research meets Wednesday at 8.15 p.m., 1219 Chestnut street, Philadelphia. No conditions or qualifications are attached to membership. Discussions each week are opened by special addresses, ten minute speeches following. Privileges are granted equally to visitors and members.

A Pious Congressman Twice Answered.

TO HON. ELIJAH A. MORSE, of Massachusetts, My Dear Sir: After reading in the Washington Post, of January 15th, a part of the sermon or lecture delivered by you on the evening of the 14th, in the Eastern Presbyterian church of Washington, I could not refrain from answering the statements you are reported to have made, wishing it to be well understood that I have no fears regarding Mr. Ingersoll's ability to defend himself and his position without my aid, but at the same time I deem it imperative that the "Infidels" of this country and of other countries as well stand firm for truth. "If the Bible pertains to anything it pertains to the concerns of the soul. Concerns which outweigh the concerns of time as eternity is longer than time, hence it is a matter of great consequence that we come to study this book with a teachable spirit, and with a desire to know the truth." "If the Bible pertains to anything it pertains to the soul!" Will you, sir, please tell me where in all the Bible proper, the Old Testament, can be found one line wherein is claimed for the soul a future state of existence as Christians of to-day use the word? Not in one single place can it be found, not once have there been promises made of a city celestial and life eternal, where the souls of men will live forever and sing praises before the throne of God. When you run over the references where the word soul is used in the Bible proper you will find that nearly every one of them refers you to some passage in the New Testament, which is itself a book added to the Bible within the last few centuries. Trace the word soul back and you will find that it did not mean something to live eternally, as we now understand it. Some authors claim it to have meant life, others mind, as pertaining to thought. Now, Mr. Morse, we see in our insane asylums demented and idiotic ones whose minds are entirely gone, their lives a total blank, thus proving from a Christian standpoint that many are born here without a soul and many more lose their souls and yet remain alive, and some reach great age. What disposition will God make of these blanks—these soulless ones? You know, Mr. Morse, that God is no respecter of persons; then how could he create men with great souls like yours and Ingersoll's, and at the same time create so many soulless ones after making mansions and telling us to pray for an entrance thereto? You know that the soul, life, or mind, is that which will make that entrance. "If the Bible pertains to anything it pertains to the concerns of the soul." The Bible proper is a vast record of bloody battles, and villainous murders, yet in no instance do we find records to prove that requiems were sung for the repose in the future life of the souls of the butchered victims. No, prayer only for aid to kill instead of being killed. Women had no souls until a very late date; not, in fact, until the seventh century was it admitted by those wise saints and Christian fathers that the laws of the Bible pertained to the female except as an appendix to man. She had no soul before then, and even at this date there is in Russia a religion which teaches the same. Yet woman came under church laws and priestly tyranny just as strictly as if she had an immortal soul. Now, Mr. Morse, what became of all those half-souled people who lived before the seventh century? In fact, may I inquire how a soulless mother could produce male children with souls and female children without souls?

"Concerns which outweigh the concerns of time as eternity is longer than time, hence it is a matter of great consequence that we come to study this book with a teachable spirit and with a desire to know the truth." Accepting this as correct, do you remember, sir, that from the fifth century until the close of the fifteenth century the Bible as scripture was a forbidden book; that a Comstock law was in existence then which prohibited the reading or studying of it, and that a bill was introduced in Parliament closing to the laity that volume which you say teaches the separation of time from eternity? May I ask what will or has become of the souls of those men who knew of your book only as they were taught that they were liable to be struck dead if they touched it?

You tell us, sir, to come with a teachable spirit. It is well you did not advise your hearers to come with an inquiring spirit, for I never yet have seen the person who could withstand the doubt and unbelief that enter his mind when reading the Bible in a spirit of inquiry. Sir, you struck the key note—keep the people teachable on lines of religion, of Christianity, and you keep them from progress, from mental freedom, and from knowledge.

What do you mean by "time and eternity"? This earth has been here for millions of years. Men lived and died as far back as we have records. I suppose their time ceased and their eternity began when they died, yet to all the rest of us their eternity is just time? Or have their souls remained all these years in a state of suspended duration, waiting for eternity to begin? You cannot to save your life define the word eternity without using the word time or some of its synonyms. Why the distinction, since there is no difference?

"Mr. Ingersoll wants to know who was Cain's wife, or who was Melchisedec's father." These questions, though unanswerable, are trifling. Why bother the brain over them? What I want to know is, Who made God? Who was his companion? for there were at least two gods, since he said, "Let us make man in our own image." We are also told that God made all things—"without him was not any thing made that was made." Then surely he was his own creator. Talmage once said that he created this world out of his omnipotence. Probably you can tell us whether or not he made himself out of the same raw material. If he did, who or what created omnipotence?

"He wants to know forty thousand senseless questions that are of no earthly concern whatever." I disagree with you there, for one question that Ingersoll asks is certainly of earthly use, namely, "What pleasure or what consolation can possibly be afforded priests by preaching eternal damnation for a human soul?" Can you tell wherein lies the pleasure? Now, Mr. Morse, suppose I ask this question, "What shall I do to gain eternal life?" and suppose you answer, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Then suppose further that I have been a student of nature's laws, and I refuse; I cannot believe the story of the miraculous conception of Christ. And suppose, again, that I have been a student of history, and refuse to accept the story of the New Testament, knowing that there are no records of any kind whatever of Christ until nearly two hundred years after his death. In that contingency, what am I to do about inheriting eternal life?

You quote this from the Bible: "He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Allow me also to quote some from your book:

For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast; for all is vanity. All go unto one place, all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of beast that goeth downward to the earth? (Ecc. iii, 19-21). For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope; for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy is now perished; neither have they any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun (ix, 4-6).

Besides these there is that passage where we find that if a tree falls to the north or to the south, there it shall lie.

"Mr. Ingersoll says there are three hundred contradictions in this book." Yes, sir, there are nearly if not quite one thousand perfectly plain, flat contradictions in your Bible, your word of God; and not only is it replete with self-contradictions, but that learned English divine, Dr. John Mills, who made the Bible a study for thirty years, boldly asserted that he had found more than eighty thousand different ways of reading that book. Can you still claim, then, that this relic of barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, which can be read and understood eighty thousand different ways, is the inspired work of divinity, and that it is infallible and the only hope we have of the life beyond? You claim that the book is all right if rightly understood, yet we are taught in it "that wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein." Now, which of these eighty thousand readings is right, and who has erred?

"While he was on his way to deliver his last blasphemous lecture in this city, there was an average of two churches a day built in this country." Yes, and on an average two million persons went hungry, or hunger, debt, and destitution stared them in the face. A queer God you have. How can you expect sensible people, educated people, with a spark of humanity in them, to bow on naked knees on cold and costly stones, and kiss the richly carved altars of God's own temple, while the wolf of hunger is driving them on to despair or theft, suicide or murder? Answer, thou Representative of the People!

"Ingersoll is as powerless to stop the progress of the gospel as a chipping squirrel sitting on a railroad track would be to stop the Chicago lighting express, or as a bobolink, sitting on the fence, to stop the rising sun." Ingersoll is not the stopping power, Mr. Morse; he is merely a man endowed with a spirit of investigation, and grand and fearless in owning and expressing his belief respecting religion. The power which is stopping the gospel is thought—education, progress, and science. This is the force which cannot be stopped—not now; though the time was when you Christians hindered it. That time is past; you, with all your gods and Christs, priests and churches, stand merely as stumbling-blocks in the path of progress.

"And I say, God pity the man who dashes himself against the bosses of Jehovah's buckler." Mr. Morse, you seem to forget that some power, call it progress, science, or Ingersoll, has compelled men to spend thousands of dollars within the last two decades in getting out a new version of the Bible that will keep pace with thought. You seem to forget that that bigoted, tyrannical body of fanatical zealots, called the Presbyterian church, has been driven within the last three years into changing its "scheme of salvation." What has done this? Progress, sir, and neither you nor your God can stop its wheels.

"Mr. Ingersoll says that the Bible is a bad book, and it is not fit to be read in the family." Anyhow, friend, here in Kansas a man was recently arrested and is still under bonds, awaiting trial, for sending just one verse of your pure book through the mails. This is J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kan. I have in my library a book of 169 pages, "The Holy Bible (Abridged)," compiled from King James's translation, which is just a collection of the vulgar and obscene verses of your book, and I often wonder why we never see any of this part of the Bible on the Sunday-school Bible lesson leaves? If the book is so pure, why garble it?

"Mr. Ingersoll says that a religious life is a life of melancholy." Mr. Morse, I have known several and have heard of hundreds more who have gone insane over the fear that they might innocently and ignorantly commit the sin against the Holy Ghost, for which, you know, there is no forgiveness. Others have gone crazy over the thought that they might gain life eternal and their beloved companions or darling children might be cast into hell fire.

"Of all the cheerful, happy men who walk the face of the earth is the man whose sins are forgiven and whose peace is made with God." Mr. Morse, you never saw a really cheerful, happy, contented person who was a stanch Christian. How can a person be happy and contented knowing that millions are being swept into hell every day? No, sir; a Christian is one who prays continually for the remission of sins. Why, the world is full of sins, and a true Christian is always crying over them, "for each sin demands a tear," you know. Christianity, happiness, and sin, are three things which cannot exist together.

"Mr. Ingersoll is reported to have asked, 'How do you know that there is such a god as the God of the Bible?'" My little five-year-old boy, Wendell Phillips, puts it in this way: "Mamma, if there is a God, why doesn't he come down and show himself?—then we would believe." You say, "We might ask Ingersoll if he has seen his own brains." Now, Mr. Morse, candidly, this is the weakest point you have tried to make. I certainly know that there is such a person as Queen Victoria, yet I never saw her. Thousands of human bodies have been dissected and though there is a difference of quality and of quantity, yet the possession of brains by every vertebrate animal is a fact established by universal observation and experience. Ingersoll therefore has conclusive evidence that his brain exists, although he has not seen it; but in no authentic records do we learn that anyone has seen God. Not in all the cycles, among all the innumerable millions of people who have inhabited this globe, has even one seen God or seen anyone else who had. Nor has anyone seen his handiwork except as they have called Nature such. Then why not study Nature, and cease to worship a myth which ignorance and superstition have placed behind it? Yours for truth,

ETTA SEMPLE,

Pres. Kansas Freethought Association.

AN AUDITOR'S REMARKS.

A short time ago I listened to an address by the Hon. Elijah A. Morse, M.C., at the Eastern Presbyterian church in this city on the subject, "Christianity vs. Infidelity."

As a lover of Freethought and truth, and as a believer in the exercise of reason and common sense, I feel constrained to reply to this address; and as the pulpit is deemed too sacred a place for an infidel to occupy while expressing his honest convictions, I shall offer my reply through THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The gentleman's remarks only again exemplify some of the modern Christian ideas of religious discussion. The objects and ends of his speech may be summed up as follows: First, to prove the genuineness of the Christian religion by citing the testimony of men who have lived and died believing in its teachings; second, to show that infidelity is premeditated, and that all Infidels are fools, led by Bob Ingersoll, the great Infidel fool paramount.

He revived the death-bed story of Daniel Webster, who seems to be a standing witness and referee in all controversies over the validity of Christianity; and also introduced the testimony of other men, great and small, who had lived and died in the Christian faith; and this alone was his proof of its genuineness. He urges that this is sufficient evidence to convince any sensible man, and designates as fools all who, after hearing of such renowned confessions, are stubborn enough to doubt.

Probably Mr. Morse forgets that every other religious faith is provided with an abundance of the same kind of testimony as to its validity. He forgets that the savage Indian, although he has never read of the flood, or the "feast of the passover," and knows nothing whatever of the atonement, dies with as bright a hope of reaching the happy hunting ground as Daniel Webster had of heaven. He has forgotten that the Jews wrote the Bible he adores, and produced the Christ he defends; yet they denounce as a blasphemous lie the divinity of Jesus of Nazareth. Is it possible that the Bible is the only correct and truthful story the Jews ever wrote? Am I obliged to believe it because Daniel Webster did? Does the mere believing a story make it true? If so, what shall I do about Mohammedanism? People believe that. What about Catholicism? That is only another form of recognizing and worshipping Mr. Morse's messiah, yet he does not recommend or approve of it, even though some of the greatest men have testified to its validity in the hour of death. He lays down a general rule, which he declares sufficient to convince any sensible person, yet when this rule is applied to anything besides faith in Jesus Christ, he positively refuses to recognize it.

If the testimony of men who believe in a theory is to be accepted as conclusive proof of its correctness, then every religion that has ever been advocated by any nation or tongue is as well established as Christianity; and if we accept one as genuine upon such testimony, we are bound to accept all.

What a misfortune that Mr. Ingersoll is such a fool! What a pity that the God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, and Mr. Morse did not endow the Colonel with brains like those of Christian folks! brains capable of absorbing the most palpable absurdities without asking a question? Why was he not gifted with a mind strong enough to harmonize, with clear and easy reconciliation, all the obvious inconsistencies and manifest incongruities, as well as the three hundred and over positive contradictions, found in holy writ; with an intellect able to conceive of inconsistency as a virtue, discordance as a tower of strength, incongruity as corroboration, and contradiction as the noblest work of an infinit God! It is remarkably strange that such a "fool" has been permitted to run at large so long.

But why do Mr. Morse and his millions of Christian fellows so envy the eloquence and intellectual superiority of Mr. Ingersoll? Why do they hesitate to give him either justice or a hearing? Why do they seek so diligently to find even a flaw in his noble and spotless character, with which as a weapon they might strike reason and common sense another blow? Why, instead of these futile attempts to injure the reputation of Mr. Ingersoll, do they not pray for him to become a Christian minister, and thereby bring into the field at least one man who will use argument instead of dogma, reason instead of miracle, and candor instead of cowardly innuendo?

Mr. Morse denies the charge of Mr. Ingersoll that the Bible is an immoral book. He answers this charge by asking, "Did reading the Bible make your father a bad man? Did reading the Bible make your mother a bad woman?" This is his argument. Is it not thorough and convincing? The worst criminals of modern ages have been Christians, and the most monstrous crimes have been committed by the most zealous believers. There is nothing in the Bible, apart from the morality it incidentally teaches, to discourage the commission of crime; on the other hand, the proffer of forgiveness places a premium upon it. Who fill our jails and penitentiaries, and houses of prostitution? Ask the criminal, and almost invariably he confesses his faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. What do we hear from the gallows? Songs of praise to Jesus of Nazareth, from the lips of a criminal whose victim, we are told by the Presbyterian minister, is at that moment writhing in an everlasting hell! Isn't this a blessed doctrine? From the pearly gates the criminal will soon see his victim in hell! With due respect for all honest believers of this creed, I want to stop right here long enough to say, Damn such a doctrine!

Mr. Morse charges that Mr. Ingersoll is lecturing for money. I am astonished that a member of Congress should make such an accusation. Surely nothing could have occurred in his own upright public life that would lead his mind to entertain this suspicion! He says: "Mr. Ingersoll is as powerless to check the progress of Christianity as a squirrel on a railroad track is to stop the Chicago lightning express; or a bobolink, sitting on the fence, to prevent the sun from rising." This may be true, but if so, how do you account for the progress of Infidelity? It is gaining ground every day and every hour. Every glad moment some gloomy, despondent Christian mind is penetrated and illumined by the irresistible light of reason. Every moment some sad heart, burdened by Christian dogmas and theological absurdities, is being reached and relieved by the acceptance of common sense. Everywhere and at all times mental activity and free thought are taking the place of misery and long suffering for Christ's sake. Infidel papers and Infidel books are read all over the land by the countless thousands of good people who once believed in Jesus Christ, but who now prefer common sense to orthodoxy, and would sell their interest in the child of Bethlehem at a considerable discount. I might add here also that Mr. Morse, with all the ministers of the gospel, and the combined priesthood, are likewise as powerless to check the progress of free thought and reason and the intelligent exercise of common sense (which lead directly to Infidelity) as a crippled ground-mouse would be to reverse the Niagara Falls or a New Jersey musketo to alter the laws of gravitation. Besides, his attempt to belittle Colonel Ingersoll is as futile and cowardly as his efforts have been to support Christianity. He might as well employ his time throwing feathers against a brick wall. Why does he stand up in the pulpit and openly denounce all persons as fools simply because they do not believe in Jesus Christ? If I am a fool, he shows his God very little respect in ridiculing his handiwork by telling people so publicly. It is certainly no compliment to God as an author to be told so often that his works are imbecil. If God is as sensitive to such insinuations as he is to being disbelieved, or to the rejection of his son Jesus, or even the mocking of his bald-headed prophet Elisha by some little children, he will make it warm for Brother Morse some day.

A fool is rather to be pitied than denounced, and I should judge that a God would experience considerable humiliation on a public day to hear one of his chosen flock charging from the pulpit that a certain man was a fool, when probably the almighty had expended all his ingenuity on that fellow, even hoping to make of him a member of Congress or a minister of the gospel. We are taught that idiots are already saved; that they alone are saved without faith in Jesus. How enviable, then, is their condition! The next grade, I suppose, are those who are saved by faith.

Mr. Morse closed his discussion in the usual way by branding as a fool, and on a sure road to hell, everyone who would not give his adherence to the man who said, "Believe in me and you shall have everlasting life." He attacked with much bitterness the consolation offered by Mr. Ingersoll at the grave of his brother. What kind of consolation would Mr. Morse give at the grave of a man who did not believe, or even a man who believed, but had neglected the means of grace, or at the grave of a Hindoo, or a Roman Catholic? How sweet would be annihilation compared to such consolation as he would offer!

The speaker gave an unailing cure for Infidelity, and I have copied the recipe for use in my own case. It is as follows: to wit, "Read the Bible with a prayerful heart and a sincere desire to understand its teachings." He would better have said, "Lay it away, don't think about it, don't talk about it, believe it. Ignorance is far better than education, for the ignorant believe without thinking and without comprehending or understanding. They are willing to accept as true the most unreasonable statements and obvious impossibilities without hesitation, explanation, or proof." These are the kind of people that Mr. Morse calls "smart;" but those who ask questions, exercise reason and judgment, and finally doubt, and produce irresistible and unanswerable argument against Christianity, are, in his judgment, "fools."

Observations.

I once predicted, and have always been anxious to repeat the offense, that the first exploit of enfranchised woman, clothed with authority to legislate, would be a vote for the parson. That was a miscue, for the facts are otherwise. The Hon. Mrs. Holly, of the Colorado legislature, who is the only honorable lady I now call to mind, has introduced a bill for the taxation of church property. More power to her. It is true that the honorable member has caused the passage of a law raising the age of consent, which is objected to as likely to encourage girls to lie, but all must concede to women a superior knowledge of the matter involved, as well as the right, if either sex possesses it, to enact appropriate legislation. In view of the legal and other disabilities that man has imposed upon woman, it would only serve him with stern justice if she were to covenant with her sisters not to consent at all.

Dispraise of the late encyclical of the pope of Rome, in which document that blasé functionary hinted that the Catholic church would appreciate an increase of patronage and favors from the local authorities, has set his hired men about the task of showing that he did not mean what he said. The first one of these to be heard from is the Very Rev. Augustus F. Hewit, superior-general of the Paulist Fathers. How a very reverend person differs in degree from one who is not very reverend, I am not prepared to say; neither do I care a damn, as the saying is; but whatever his position, Mr. Hewit has attempted to deceive the people, and must be summoned to descend.

Two weeks since I quoted some lines from the encyclical, in which the author of that document said that while the church in this country is free to live and act without hindrance, being "unopposed by the Constitution and government of your nation, fettered by no hostile legislation, and protected against violence by the common laws and the impartiality of the tribunals," nevertheless "it would be very erroneous to draw the conclusion that in America is to be sought the type of the most desirable status of the church, or that it would be universally lawful or expedient for state and church to be, as in America, dissevered and divorced." Such is the language of the pope. Now Mr. Augustus F. Hewit, the very reverend person before mentioned, offers the surmise that this Has been inserted, not as having a bearing upon America, but in view of some other countries, to prevent would-be innovators on their order from applying the commendation given to the American system in view of the particular state of things in this republic to other nations where it is diverse.

Not very luminous writing, but I am under the necessity of reproducing his words in order to quote them. They mean that the pope is not, as he says he is, dissatisfied with the state of affairs here, but would not like to see church and state divorced in countries where they are now united.

There is no warrant at all for putting Mr. Hewit's construction on the language of the encyclical, for in a sentence immediately following what has here been quoted from it, his holiness says that the growth and prosperity of the church in America is to be attributed, not to the freedom she enjoys, but "By all means to the fecundity with which God has endowed her." And then he adds:

She would bring forth more abundant fruits if, in addition to liberty, she enjoyed the favor of the laws and the patronage of the public authority.

This means one of two things—either that the pope is satisfied with the condition of the church in America and does not desire to see her bringing forth more abundant fruits than she is now producing; or, that he wishes her to be more abundantly fruitful, and therefore would have her enjoy "the favor of the laws and the patronage of the public authority."

Let me rub it in a little deeper. The encyclical says:

The church among you, unopposed by the Constitution and government of your nation, fettered by no hostile legislation, protected against violence by the common laws and the impartiality of the tribunals, is free to live and act without hindrance.

That is true, but does the pope say that it is satisfactory—that it is sufficient? He does not so say: He does not say that it is satisfactory or desirable in this country or elsewhere, but he does say:

It would be very erroneous to draw the conclusion that in America is to be sought the type of the most desirable status of the church.

And as to the sufficiency of what America grants to the church, does he acknowledge it? He does not. If he did, why should he throw out this feeler?—

But she would bring forth more abundant fruits if, in addition to liberty, she enjoyed the favor of the laws and the patronage of the public authority.

One who is not very reverend, and therefore permitted to be candid, would surmise that if the language addressed to the archbishops and bishops of America had been intended for the edification of those of other countries, it would have been sent to them by a more direct route than by way of the brethren of the United States and through the medium of the English tongue.

But when Mr. Hewit has finished surmising that the pope wants the separation of church and state maintained, he uses language which shows that he is himself of another opinion. Says he:

It is un-American for the state to ally itself with the sect of the secularist.

I can only with gentleness admonish Mr. Hewit that a state is a sect of secularists, so far as secularists can be sectarian. Whether the state allying itself to itself would be un-American is a matter in which a conclusion is not to be too hastily formed. "Un-American" is a term not universally understood of the people, who only know that whom the demagogues would destroy they first call un-American.

When the church asks favors of the state, as when a "respectable female solicits the patronage of a gentleman of means," the object, I infer, is some sort of union. If the widowed spouse of Christ is looking for consolation outside of a legal union the act is altogether inconsistent with her professed code of morals. I think she is intriguing for the nuptials. Any way, she gains nothing in respectability by denying it while the present relations are maintained.

When I was running a paper on the Pacific coast a contributor insisted on sending me poetry for publication. For a time I whipped it into shape and printed it, but finally I got tired and announced that if he did not cease sending me poems I would print one of them just as he wrote it. Thereupon he "dropped," and I have not known him to write any poetry since. But the penalty wherewith I threatened him has fallen upon myself: Mr. H. L. Green, Editor of the Freethought Magazine, wrote me not long ago for a sketch of my checkered career out of which he might get a biography to accompany my picture in his monthly publication. I accommodated him with a roughly written piece, and instead of rewriting it in his well-known terse and forceful style he reproduces my words without modification. I call that an inelegant thing to do, and inconsistent for a man who believes in a censorship of the press.

Mr. Green asks me four questions, as follows. They touch upon a subject whereabout my interest has for the time relaxed, but since ignoring them might be deemed discourteous, I will reproduce and answer them. Says he:

1. Are you in favor of having the law against religious persecution, against rape, and against arson repealed?

No, I am not. The commission of these crimes invades the liberty of their victims. I would augment the penalties for such outrages. His next is:

3. If the "Comstock Law" was so amended, as Colonel Ingersoll claims it should be, so that it could be used for no purpose but to prevent real obscene matter passing through the mails, after such amendment, would you desire to have it repealed?

Yes. I would not compromise with Comstock. Repeal his law and abolish him.

3. Are you in favor of allowing real obscene literature to be sent through the United States mails?

I am not afraid to say yes to that. The meaning of mail matter is not a question to be considered by the postman.

4. Would you be in favor of having all laws repealed by which innocent people sometimes suffer? If yes, then would not that be equivalent to asking that there be no laws, as innocent people sometimes suffer under any law?

That is not pertinent, but it may be answered thus: If on the whole the enforcement of a law works greater hardship than its infraction, I would have it repealed. The question between Mr. Green and myself, I apprehend, is one of method. If his right hand offended him, he would cut it off. If his neighbor offended him, he would lock him up. I, however, would first inquire whether the grievance was a real or imagined one. I have never believed that my opinion about literature would be any nearer right if it was enforced by law. Admitting the evil of bad books and bad pictures, I guess that we shall be safer if we make ourselves proof against their influence than we shall be if we depend upon a law to suppress them. At least, we shall know that in the observance of a law, we are not oppressing anyone unjustly. Give us more backbone. Make us more robust, and let us get out of the cradle. Casting our sins on Jesus and fortifying our weaknesses with laws are, in my judgment, equally unmanly. My independence of Comstock as a moral nurse is hereby declared.

News and Notes.

I was delighted to meet Col. J. A. Zabriskie at Tucson, who is one of the finest orators of the West, and an enthusiastic reformer. He is thoroughly acquainted with this great country; has traveled extensively and occupied many official positions, and has had superior advantages for the study of American life. Especially is he well posted regarding the language, customs, and tendencies of the Mexican people, and the work of their great leaders. Mexico is a truly wonderful country; wonderful in its scenery, wonderful in its changing history, and wonderful in the triumph of Liberal ideas over the dark rule of the priesthood. In many respects Mexico is in advance of our own country in political movements; although the church has still a terrible grip upon the masses; while the intelligent Mexican gentleman is a Freethinker. Mexico has a brilliant career before it if men like Diaz can hold the sway. Colonel Zabriskie has visited Mexico, mingled with its people widely and has written one of the best books on Mexico that I have yet seen. It is full of information, given in a sparkling and vigorous manner. The Colonel is a keen observer, he looks with the eyes of science and is animated with the spirit of Freethought, and his facile pen has furnished a most interesting account of a beautiful land and a strange and varied people, over whom is the romance of the immeasurable past and the dreams of a poetic future, jeweled with nature's richest prizes.

Gen. Thomas F. Wilson is another of our prominent Freethinkers in Tucson who does not fear to stand by his colors. Isaac E. Crum, in California, Texas, and in Arizona, has always taken the brunt of the battle. In all three of these states he has been my fellow worker and aided materially in the success of the cause. Judge F. K. Miller, E. W. Smith, A. J. Davidson, J. C. Etchells, Charles Etchells, are among the old-time comrades. I was pleased to meet Mr. James Hay, recently from England, where he was in the Secular ranks. He is now on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER, with George Pusch, Carl Carlson, and others. An addition of over fifty names was made to the Freethought Federation. The A. P. A. is working vigorously against the Catholic power, which in this community, composed so largely of the old Mexican element, is quite powerful, and a political battle is on hand. I am under obligations to Wm. Reid for the kindly use of his opera house, which was of great aid to our meetings. Among those on the list of membership are Jacob Schreck, C. Schumacher, Richard Star, W. F. Dyer, W. C. Knox, Wm. Siewert, David Kennedy, W. F. Roth, B. F. Zabriskie, David L. Hughes, Alex. Ezekiel, Emanuel Drachman, and M. R. Slater. If we can only keep together and perfect the local organization a very radical work can be accomplished at Tucson. The predominance of the Catholic church is an incentive to reform. The necessity for eternal vigilance is seen. The church is doing what it can to destroy the public school. The Jesuit emissaries are active. We see much of that same insidious and treacherous power which came so near destroying the liberties of Mexico. The old Spanish monks came to Tucson almost immediately after the conquest by Cortez. A church over three hundred years old is near by. I understand that through the efforts of Senator Teller of Colorado, one thousand dollars was appropriated by Congress for the repairing of this church, and still all who enter the church are charged fifty cents admission by the priests, who of course pocket these proceeds, at the same time they are aided by the public treasury. This is a specimen of the way priests and politicians play into each other's hands and rob the people.

However, Tucson is getting to be quite Americanized. It is coming into line with the progress of the age. The modern elegance mingles with its ancient appearances and brick and marble take the place of adobe. About ten thousand years ago this country was evidently a garden, glittering with canals, and many colored fruits and flowers and I do not see, with modern skill, why it cannot flourish with the same adornments, and produce the same material wealth; and lay the foundation of a high civilization.

I leave Tucson in the middle of the night, and travel until the morning sun is aflame in the heavens, when I arrive at Phoenix, the chief city of Arizona, which certainly fronts the future with golden colors. I was pleased to meet Dr. Miller, who came from Prescott to join our forces here, and who gave renewed spirit to our work, and so Phoenix has been a most successful point. I gave two lectures and I think that about five hundred people were present at each lecture, and they were enthusiastically in sympathy with the ideas presented. I feel that we have had quite a brilliant culmination of our territorial campaign in these crowded meetings at the capital of the territory. Members of the legislature, now in session, were present. At the close of the lecture Thursday evening, the members of the Freethought Federation organized. J. B. Lacy was chosen president, Joseph Bowyer, secretary, and J. H. W. Jensen, treasurer. These are staunch Freethinkers; Mr. Lacy is president of the city gas works company, and is a prominent citizen—Jensen is an old-timer, has been in Phoenix I think ever since its birth, and has always been at the front. Mr. Bowyer is a new man in our ranks at this point and is a determined worker. Among others at Phoenix, is Joe Thalheimer, who furnished the Secular Pilgrim with plenty of good things. If any Freethinker ever strikes Phoenix he had better take quarters at the Central Hotel. Frank Wagner, on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER, took me out to his ranch, and introduced me to his wife and children, who I guess will be Freethinkers as time rolls on. J. R. Cram also comes upon the list. J. B. Mullen is a neighbor of Jensen on the Gila river, and a soldier to the end of the campaign. R. N. Upton, James McNamara, John Lewis, John Hurley, Hans Herlich, and A. E. Pitkin are in the same company. I was glad to meet T. B. Weller, formerly of Colfax, Wash., Dettmer whom I first met at Dillon, Montana, and Tony Ferris, who was a contributor to the work at Tucson three years ago. Mrs. Hawley, Mrs. Rembert, and others of the ladies are not afraid to be allies of advanced thought. I like Phoenix and hope it will always remain as promising as to-day. The population is constantly increasing, coming and going like the waves of the sea; but Phoenix may boast of the finest climate on the globe. Salt River valley can be made one of the most fertile domains. Peach trees are already in bloom and oranges flash their yellow splendors. The strawberries here are simply delicious, and make one wish to live forever in this happy valley. Here is the nectar of the gods. The only trouble is that the softness and luxuriance of the climate are apt to make the blood thin, and it needs occasionally an incursion from the Northern country to keep the blood flowing and the mind at its best. And this is continually happening. The billows of immigration are perpetually flashing at this central point. The Arizona Central railroad recently built by the indomitable energy of Frank Murphy, from Ash Fork to Prescott and on to Phoenix will open great avenues of trade, and advance the country to new prosperity. Arizona will present a marvellous change in the next decade, and I want the flag of Freethought to float over it with increased brilliance.

I am obliged to be aroused from my slumbers at 3 o'clock Friday, February 8th, in order to take the stage for the end of the railroad now only twenty miles distant. Dr. Miller and myself are comrades on this journey. We take the train at 8 o'clock A. M., and at 6 P. M. are in Prescott. We climb again into the snowy mountains and breathe the crisp air of winter in contrast to the summer-like beauty in which we revealed during the morning hours. On arrival at Prescott we have a jolly supper at Dr. Miller's, and with our keen appetites try to demolish an enormous roast beef that would delight the heart of a sturdy Englishman. I then take conveyance with Mr. J. K. Hall and his daughter for their home, about fifteen miles away. We have a splendid drive through the effulgent moonlight, and the hills and valleys, as we sweep along, shine in changing luster. We arrive at our destination about midnight, and I sink with but little delay into a calm and peaceful slumber, and do not awake until about ten o'clock the next morning. I rest all day long, and roam through realms of poetry and romance among the books of the varied library of Sharlot M. Hall, whose name is already known to many magazines for stories and poems and essays illustrative of Arizona life. I enjoy the quiet of this out-of-the-way country home, where nature's wild and savage aspect mingles with scenes of beauty. In the evening we all pile into the big wagon—five of us—and go to the lonely school-house where about a baker's dozen meet us. There is no fire when we get to this temple of learning. We have to unlock the gates, and then forage for wood. After a while the fire is blazing and we get warmed up and I give my lecture, and I put as much Freethought into a talk of an hour and a half as I could, for I knew that I should not have another chance to speak in this school-house on the confines of civilization. I had a good audience so far as it went, "fit though few," and I enjoyed this pioneer labor. The moon was shining brightly in an apparently unclouded sky when I began, but when I finished the ground was white with snow, and it was driving furiously along. However, we fronted the storm, and our staunch team pulled us rapidly through. I thus had the pleasure of a first-class snow storm almost immediately after leaving the verdure of the tropics. It was a pleasing sensation, to witness such a variety of phenomena in so short a space of time and travel.

However, the snow, now Sunday morning, Feb. 10th, is rapidly disappearing, and I guess I shall not be blocked on my journey Eastward. I lecture once again in Prescott. We have had a lively controversy in the newspapers. The Catholic priest, with the rest of them, has pitched in. It is almost impossible to follow up all the lies that are told. The priest says that the pope wept when he heard of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and utterly repudiated the transaction, although history records that he ordered a Te Deum to be sounded from the steeples of Rome. The Methodist minister asserts that the Roman Emperor Julian was an "Infidel," although he was an orthodox believer in the ancient gods; also that he rebelled against the "great and good" Constantine; was a hypocrite and a murderer. He also declared that Spinoza was an awfully bad man; that Voltaire was guilty of almost every crime; that Hume died with the horrors of a guilty conscience, and of course Thomas Paine perished as a drunkard, and did nothing for the liberty of America. He asserted that Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, and Lincoln were representative Christians. He asserted that Christianity was the source of every invention, of every discovery, and of all modern science. He lauded Wesley to the skies, although he was a Tory and bitterly opposed to the American Revolution. He also declared that there were only a few Infidels in the country while there were ten millions of Methodists. This colossal lying and playing upon the ignorance and superstition of his audience is almost beyond belief. I wonder how much of the knave is mingled with the folly. I do not think a clergyman in the East would dare to make such statements before his congregation. I suppose the clergymen here think they can foist any canard upon the Western people. But they are mistaken. The Western people read and think and know history, and in the darkness of the mines there is reason. They are not fools in this country, and are not easily humbugged by these ecclesiastical descendants of Balaam's beast of burden, who talk without having the "revelation" of their ancient progenitor.

I am writing these notes at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. K. Hall and daughter and son, Edward V. Hall, who are all indomitable Freethinkers, and represent the growing element of this country. I find plenty of encouragement for the stern and harsh battle which confronts the reformer here. Every artifice is resorted to by our enemies, but there is no argument. There is no pretense of any argument. It is simply pure abuse—the tactics of the dark ages. Only the power is lacking to kindle the fires of persecution. I wish that some of our easy going Freethinking friends could realize what we have to contend against. We here see the claws of the beast. They are not sheathed as in more educated communities, where they dare not bid such defiance to modern civilization.

I leave Prescott Feb. 12th for Santa Fe, N. Mex., where I lecture Feb. 13, 14, 15. I shall be at Trinidad, Col., from Feb. 17 to March 1.

I set sail the last of April for a three month's tour in England. I look forward with pleasure to labor among our trans-Atlantic allies and expect to find a wealth of enthusiasm and success to communicate to our friends on this side. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Lecture Notes.

From Cincinnati to Grafton, West Virginia, a town on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, built among the Alleghenies. Here I found a great number of staunch Liberals, headed by Mr. Geo. W. Chambers, the mayor. Notwithstanding his unpopular opinions he has been elected to this office six times, and the preachers exerting their efforts to knife him on every occasion. Though my audience at the lecture was not large, it was attentive, and appreciative, and the demand for Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on the Bible was very good. It must be gratifying to Liberals to know that the colonel is now doing such a grand work. He has the attention of the people as never before, and his influence is greater than at any other time in his career. His published works demolish superstition where the magnificent personality of the author is unknown, and will continue to do so when his eloquent voice is still. Newmanstown, Pa., is one of the oldest towns in the state, being early settled by Germans. Here I gave one lecture to a good audience. Prof. W. R. Bach made the arrangements. He is the schoolmaster of the place, and the leader in mental emancipation as well. Mr. Geyser, and Mr. Richard Sechner ably second him. The people of Newmanstown speak the German language, but they all understand English. They have maintained German manners and customs to a great extent. The Lutheran and Reformed are the prevailing churches of these people, but the younger generation has imbibed the spirit of freedom, and Liberalism is taking a great hold upon them. It may be surprising to know that Freethought is making such strides in the rural districts. There the people have more time to think, and more independence to express their thoughts. In the cities it is different. The rush and tear for the almighty dollar is greater. Mother Grundy is more powerful. There is less time to think, and more tyranny of public opinion.

Again I start on my journey and in a few hours am in the old city of Philadelphia. The reception accorded me there was such as to give me delight for many a day. Why should it not when the large hall of the Friendship Liberal League was full of enthusiastic Freethinkers, the pillars and the platform decorated with American flags, sweet music delighting the ear, and the name of Thomas Paine and his grand work for humanity in every mind. About seven hundred people were present at the evening lecture—the largest audience in the history of the League. Four years ago if half this number could be rallied in Philadelphia for a Paine celebration, the friends were well satisfied. Freethought is growing in this great citadel of bigotry—the home of the Wanamakers and the Pattisons. Upon a visit to Independence Hall I found among the other heroes of the Revolution an oil painting of the Author-Hero. At one time his bust was thrown out by Christian intolerance, but now people of intelligence are realizing the fact that a true history of the American Revolution cannot be written with the name of Paine left out. Mr. George Longford was the first to greet me when I stepped into the hall. If there is a hard worker for the cause of Freethought in this country, it is Mr. Longford. He is the heart and soul of the Friendship Liberal League, and to his efforts are largely due the great success of our celebration. Dr. Kane is president of the League. He is an efficient officer, presiding with dignity, and arousing the enthusiasm of the audience by eloquent and appropriate remarks for the occasion. The League is preparing to have, in the near future, a hall of its own, and there can be no doubt that success will crown its efforts.

FRANKLIN STEINER.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We have given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We have also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS have been scattered broadcast over the land.

And now, during the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people have time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we have prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensive; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to give and to have given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to have one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of

EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and have it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who have the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

"Liberty for Man, Woman and Child," and the Tribute to Ebon C. Ingersoll.

So many have wanted the lecture on Liberty, and also the tribute to Colonel Ingersoll's brother, that Mr. Farrell has had them printed in one pamphlet, uniform with the other lectures and at the same price—25 cents. And he has added as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it.

This lecture on liberty for the women and children has made many converts to rationalism among the fairer portion of humanity, and it is the best one to give to the good women who have a prejudice—fostered by the ministers—against the Colonel because he has "taken away their savior." When they read this they usually revise their opinion of the apostle of liberty, and read his other works—which they wouldn't look at before. If you know a good Christian girl, any age, just give her a copy of this lecture. Postpaid, 25 cents.

In for Many Campaigns.

HACKLEMAN, IND., Jan. 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Being young in years, I am necessarily young in the Freethought cause, but having enlisted I intend to remain in the ranks until the end of the war. Inclosed find $1, for which please send the following works: "Age of Reason," "Was Christ Crucified?" "Was Jesus Insane?" and other pamphlets named.

A. R. BUMPAS

He Feels Very Fraternal.

LODI, WIS., Feb. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The tab on my paper tells me that if I want to read the best paper on earth much longer it will be necessary for me to renew my subscription at once, so here goes for two years longer. The books came all right and were good; after reading them I feel like shaking hands with the Liberals of the whole world.

Yours respectfully, N. C. SKELTON.

He Appreciates Both.

SOUTH BEND, WASH., Jan. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" received all O. K., and I want it distinctly understood that I appreciate both the book and the author, and I have already sent it out on missionary work.

You will find inclosed herewith $5.50, for which send "Facts and Fictions," the ANNUAL, "An Outline Sketch of a Solution of the Money Question," "Our Money Wars," and pamphlets named.

Very respectfully, HENRY ELLISON.

Worth Tons of Bibles.

WEST HARRISVILLE, MICH., Jan. 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received the "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" three or four months ago, and I have almost read it through, and I like it very much. It is worth a four-horse wagon load of holy Bibles. I call it my Bible; I cannot get any of the church folks to read it. Christians call me infidel because I don't believe the Bible. I tell them I am proud of the name. Please send me "All About the Bible," "Age of Reason," "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" Inclosed find $4 for the books and to renew my subscription to your paper.

Your well wisher, EDMUND APSEY.

A Virtuous Resolve.

HARWICH, MASS., Jan. 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: And so the years roll on, and you will please find $3.25 within for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the ANNUAL.

Our TRUTH SEEKER grows better if possible; pity we cannot double the number of subscribers. I will make this promise, to double my subscription if I do not secure a new subscriber by the end of this year. Who will be the other? I don't pay any pew rent; I chew nothing stronger than gum; don't make use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; smoke no tobacco, and am not extravagant in any of the good things of life. So I'll hustle and do my level best to secure a subscriber by buttonholing Tom, Dick, and Harry.

Yours for pushing, B. F. ROBBINS.

It Destroys and it Rebuilds.

WEST LIBERTY, IA., Feb. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50 to apply on my subscription. Times are hard, but they would seem a good deal harder if my weekly bible failed to put in an appearance. It is a battering-ram which is steadily, but surely, undermining the foundation of ignorance and superstition. It is a destroyer, but it rebuilds. It robs, but gives back a hundredfold. In the place of belief, it gives knowledge; instead of myth, science. Then batter away; we have passed, as Ingersoll says, the midnight in this struggle; have made a breach in the wall, and the Freethought column will eventually march through the gap victorious. Yours for mental freedom,

J. HOBBS.

An Active Missionary at Eighty.

PELLA, IA., Jan. 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received books I sent for on January 5th in good order, and have come to the conclusion to send for twelve more "Age of Reasons" to do missionary work, as the eight I previously ordered are out doing that work at present, and good work, you may be sure. Send also Ingersoll's speech in the Reynolds blasphemy case, and "Is Suicide a Sin?" I shall not, however, bother you very much longer, as I have passed my eightieth mile-stone, and on December 7th I celebrated my sixtieth wedding anniversary. It was a regular Freethought celebration, enjoyed by all present. But as long as I live I will do all I can for Freethought and your paper; I could not and would not be without it. Wishing you and all co-workers success,

WM. S. GEORGE.

"Sky Brokers" Is Not Bad.

CLEARMONT, MO., Jan. 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money order, for which send the indispensable TRUTH SEEKER. The Baptists have just closed a revival at this place, and the Methodists are preparing to storm the castle of doubt, after which the Disciples will hump themselves, so to speak; and between the three the people will have had a dose of theological nonsense likely to stupefy what brains they possess and to make it possible for a set of astute sky-brokers to exchange their titles to possessions in the New Jerusalem for mansions in Missouri.

I have received "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." It is an excellent work and one which every Freethinker should have. I am glad to have been the means of your getting at least one new subscriber. Last fall I sent him some sample copies, and am pleased to note that he has subscribed. He will remember me as the defeated Populist candidate.

Yours, JAS. F. LANE.

Four Months for Mr. Charity.

ST. MAGDALENE, IND., Jan. 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: With this I send you $7, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year; "Cosmian Hymn Book," ANNUAL; $1 worth of TRUTH SEEKERS to the veteran, Thomas S. Charity; balance $1.25 for you, to help keep the church out of the Constitution. It is somewhat late to acknowledge receipt of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I think it among the best books ever published. I like the opening exposition of the meaning of Freethought. I shall lend it to all who ask me what Freethought means and what Freethinkers want. We have in our school a young teacher, a man named Frank Welch, who reads a chapter from the Bible and prays every morning. Also in a neighboring school a woman teacher, Rosa Marsh, who does the same; both teachers are Baptist church members. Hoping all good things for you, I am yours in Freethought, ELIZA W. HAINES.

Preacher Wanted.

WESTMINSTER, CAL., Jan. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: We want a practical, educated preacher in Orange county, Cal., to preach the gospel of our saviors—Spencer, Buckle, Comte, Descartes, Hume, Humboldt, Mill, and many others, dead and alive, in order to save the good people from the toils and tyranny of the clergy, and to raise our citizens to the plane of the positive philosophy. To be more precise, we want a regular circuit rider, to visit the people after the style of the Methodist, but instead of preaching theology to preach science. We do not want an aggressive person, but one mild, pleasant, and logical—use the Catholic system of gaining converts—give their patients broken doses of unanswerable scientific thoughts. We can not afford to pay a great salary, but we can furnish all of the necessities of life, after the old-school Baptist plan, and as we get stronger we will be able to send our speaker around the world in order to get reliable information in other countries, and then, on his or her return, give us the benefit of the journey. Address,

S. P. BATES, Box 52.

An Appeal from the West.

LINCOLN, NEB., Feb. 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Will you permit me, through your valuable columns, to appeal to your charitably-inclined readers in behalf of the destitute, half-starved, half-clothed people of Nebraska? The recent cold weather has greatly augmented the suffering multitudes. In many places in this state crops of all kinds were an entire failure, leaving farmers in destitute circumstances and as helpless as little children in many cases. I am now prepared to distribute all donations coming to me from those who feel inclined to assist these struggling mortals in their efforts for an existence. My distributions go to alleviate suffering irrespective of race, color, or religion. Bacon, flour, groceries, field and garden seeds, will be very acceptable, also clothing for men, women, and children. People, in their great efforts to secure something to eat, have been unable to provide themselves with clothing, many people being almost entirely destitute in that regard. All donations will be duly acknowledged by me. Those wishing to donate money can do so.

DR. P. S. GEORGE,

Sec. State Spiritualist Ass'n, 1901 S street.

The Aftermath of the Pilgrim's Labors.

PARK RIVER, N. D., Jan. 11, 1895.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, ESQ., Dear Sir: I received the extra copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and they had the desired effect. Everybody wants to read your write-up of our town, and your friend, Reverend Campbell, to whom I presented one copy, was especially delighted to read it. I met him on the street a few days later, and he still insists that if a man die with a good conscience, he believes he will fare all right in the hereafter, whatever that may be. We have not got around to it yet [formation of Liberal League], but the spirit is among us and is bound to stay whether we organize or not. I have read the greater portion of the first-half of your work, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and I am sure that I never read a book which contained as much information as this one, and it exceeds most books by its fair treatment of adversaries; it is of no account to you what impression this book has made upon me, but it is just like an encyclopedia, but differs from the latter by not being a dry compilation of facts, but demonstrates the natural development of human thought from the dark ages of ignorance to the present century of enlightened minds, resulting in a victory over bigotry, hypocrisy, and orthodoxy. And, Brother Putnam, I am sure that when the archangel shall sound the bugle call he will say to you, "Well done, good and faithful servant," etc.

Yours very truly,

E. SMITH-PETERSON.

Sundayites Receive a Rebuff.

HAMBURG, IA., Jan. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, of Kansas City, Mo., delivered two lectures here, Dec. 22 and 23, to large audiences, notwithstanding two revivals were in progress at the time and creating considerable excitement. The majority of the Freethinkers present expressed themselves as highly pleased with the oratorical and reasoning ability of the speaker. Her logical ability cannot be questioned. She was frequently applauded. We hope she will return in the near future. She has made an impression which will be hard to overcome, and has contributed greatly to the growth of Liberalism in this city. Prof. Chas. Cowles furnished excellent music free, as he always does on occasions of this kind. The Lyceum, owned by Mr. F. W. Toedt, was also free. The hall is always free for Freethought and Spiritualist lectures. Recently an attempt has been made to pass an ordinance closing places of business on Sunday, a petition to that effect having been presented to the city council, but a remonstrance has been extensively signed by business men and citizens, so it is presumed the subject will be dropped for the present. As this attempt to force religious legislation upon the people followed a prolonged revival, it is to be inferred it was prompted by religious bigotry and intolerance, which seeks to create a monopoly of Sunday in the hope of swelling the congregation of the churches and lending a solemn and sanctimonious appearance to our lively burg on this "holy" day.

E. T. DALBY.

A Macedonian Call from Utah.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Jan. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $8 on subscription and per order inclosed. Your valuable paper is a regular and welcome visitor to our household; it is doing a lasting benefit to humanity. I am always pleased to see the lecture engagements of Colonel Ingersoll and other of the "bright lights" of Freethought; these lectures must advance our cause. I wish the Freethinkers of Utah could afford to encourage more of this secular and scientific education in our fair territory, and especially at the present time to aid in securing a more liberal and enlightened constitution for our state than any yet framed in the United States. The memory of Utah's past history should be proof to our constitutional delegates of the necessity for a secular and broad-minded law to govern our future state written (if possible) in such plain English that the courts of the future could not construe it to persecute men of unbelief in church rules.

I am not a delegate, yet if any of our Freethought friends in any of the states will furnish parts of constitutions or original compositions of a character as above indicated, suitable to be embodied in Utah's future Magna Charta, I will gladly hand to delegates that I am acquainted with, hoping thereby to aid the Liberal cause. The constitution makers begin their labors soon, in March.

With fraternal feeling to the many readers of your esteemed paper,

HECTOR W. HAIGHT.

The West Has Long Known Her.

DELPHOS, O., JAN 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Krekel has just finished a course of four lectures in this place. She not only instructed, enlightened, and encouraged the Liberals of this community, but her eloquent, logical, and convincing arguments pleased and edified all who heard her, and started many upon the road of reason and investigation. She is constructive rather than destructive, yet while she pictures the philosophy of right living in this world, she points out the evils humanity has suffered by considering the earth a "vale of tears," this world a place of exile, awaiting happiness in a life to come.

She is never offensive, but her pleasant manner, fairness, and sound reasoning lead and convince her hearers in spite of prejudice. She never attempts to drive them.

Her audiences constantly grew larger, and on the last evening the hall was crowded with an appreciative assemblage of our best citizens.

It is a lamentable fact that Mrs. Krekel has not continuous engagements for her present tour, while, if her abilities on the rostrum were as well known by the Freethinkers generally throughout the country as by those who have been fortunate enough to hear her eloquent appeals in behalf of humanity, there would not be an evening in which her services would not be demanded. When she had finished delivering a lecture to the Ohio Liberal Society in Cincinnati, they immediately engaged her for the five Sunday evenings in March, notwithstanding they generally engage a different speaker for each evening. A gentleman from Continental, O., attended one of her lectures here, and at its close, he immediately arranged with her for a meeting in his place. At the close of her address there she was engaged for a whole course of lectures in April. She has only to be heard to be appreciated, and when she returns to this part of the country she will find a hearty welcome.

Other Timely Suggestions.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Feb. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Recently I attended the funeral of a good moral man, who, though no avowed Freethinker, yet had never joined the church.

As many of his relatives were non-church-members, the two officiating ministers eagerly embraced the golden opportunity to read them a lecture from the text, "Set your house in order."

With studied art, the lacerated feelings of the mourners were so effectively wrought upon that his Christian daughter shortly after lost her reason—probably through the combined grief for her father's death and his supposed suffering in hell, and the bankruptcy of her husband (the pious son of one of said officiating ministers) through which bankruptcy her father's estate loses heavily, and her brothers and sisters thus lose a large part of their inheritance.

But Christianity ever has robbed men while living and then sent them to hell when dead, without exciting anything but the warmest admiration of its brainless devotees.

She virtually robs the Freethinkers (whom she consigns to hell) of the increased tax money she compels them to pay because of the unjust exemption of her church property.

To avoid having his motives misrepresented and censured at his funeral, every Freethinker should, at his leisure, write, or have other able persons write for him, a fitting defense of his reasons for having lived a Freethinker, requesting that it be read at his burial. Funeral audiences are generally large, and this innovation would increase the attendance so that many Freethinkers might on such occasions do more for the cause than they did on any one day while living. Requesting the reading of a certain article would be quite as proper as requesting the singing of a certain hymn, as is often done by Christians.

Shake Hands and Settle It, Friends.

PORTLAND, OR., Jan. 31, 1895.

TO THE LIBERALS OF OREGON: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 5th D. W. Smith tries to answer an article of mine, which appeared in the same paper of Nov. 24th, by twisting my words to suit himself, and dodging the main issue, namely, that he and his wife were the prime movers in running the excursion from Portland to the Oregon Secular Park and then saddled the whole responsibility upon my shoulders. Following his example, I will now cross-examine Mr. and Mrs. Smith a little, and then drop the subject, no matter what more he may write. I am sure it will not require a "scholar" to see his motives.

"Mr. Smith, were you not first vice-president of the Portland Secular Church at the time the excursion was first discussed?" "I was." "Were you not present at the executive board meeting at which it was decided to run the excursion?" "I was."

"Did you not make a motion to appoint me a committee of one to hire the boat, engage the music, etc?" "I did."

"Did you not write letters to me asking me to send up men and provisions, never asking where the money was to come from?" "I did." "Did I not pay those men's fares to the grounds?" "You did."

"Was not the circular advertising the excursion compiled and sent out all over Oregon from your castle?" "It was." "Did not that circular state that the excursion was to be run under the auspices of the First Secular Church, assisted by the O. S. S. U.?" "It did."

"Did not the church spend that money for improving the Oregon Secular Park, with the intention of donating said improvements in case the excursion should pay for them?" "It did."

"Had the O. S. S. U. any money on hand at that time?" "No, it was in debt to us at that time." "Then how can you say that had the excursion paid the church would have reaped the benefit?" "Well, I only said that because it failed to do so. Had we made enough money out of the excursion to pay for the improvements I would have claimed that as the share of the O. S. S. U., and would also have taken the credit to myself for making it a success."

"Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith, did you not state publicly from our platform that we must not lose this donation, and that as the O. S. S. U. had no money on hand, the Secular Church would have to take the matter in charge?" "I did." "Did you not urge me in every way possible to go ahead with the excursion?" "I did."

"Did you think I was treated fairly at the convention by Mr. Smith when he disclaimed any connection with the debt incurred by the excursion and called it 'my personal bill'?" "I did not." "Why not?" "Because I said to you while on the way to the depot at Forest Grove, 'Mr. Hagner, they don't want to give you any of the money raised here to pay those debts with, but you can depend upon it I will bring or send you some to Portland before the week is over.'"

Those who will turn back to my first letter will see how wilfully Mr. Smith misconstrued my words regarding the action of the president, W. W. Jesse, for I stated distinctly that he did not think we could make the excursion pay. The fourth member of the executive committee has never tried to shift the responsibility to the shoulders of some one else in the manner in which Mr. Smith has done.

I will now rest my case with the judgment of my readers, knowing that the Secularists of Portland, and feeling that every Liberal who knows anything of this case, will not fail to give justice where justice is due.

CHAS. HAGNER.

Self-Leaders Are Scarce.

COLUMBUS, O., Feb. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 to extend my subscription. I am sorry I cannot send more. It would be a severe trial to me to get along without your paper.

Your recent editorial on the "Perils of One-Ideism" appears to me particularly timely and appropriate. There are too many thoughtless people in this world who believe that we can afford to totally ignore all religious questions and devote our entire time to the consideration of economics; but if we are to have any important economic reforms, they must be led, as they always have been, by Freethinkers, and the only proper way to make Freethinkers is to strike directly at the church. All true reforms are the product of Freethought, and the church opposes nothing so obstinately, and hates nothing so heartily, as it does Freethought. It objects to it in the pulpit, in the newspaper, in the school-room, and in the college.

If a newspaper editor opens the columns of his paper for a free and honest discussion, large numbers of his subscribers are angry, many of them immediately ask him to discontinue their paper, and the most religious among them being the most thoughtless, conservative, and intolerant, are the ones most certain to do this. They have never been taught anything about toleration; the church has always objected to such teaching. They have never been taught to doubt, question, and investigate; everything possible has been done to cripple their brains and make them conservative and incapable of doing any intelligent thinking. They are satisfied with things as they find them, or they have a reverence for accepted authorities, and if one dares to question time-honored customs, they think he is crack-brained or immoral and dangerous.

If a college professor teaches his pupils that doubt is the beginning of wisdom; if he teaches them to doubt and question accepted authorities, and to try to pick flaws and find errors in every statement laid down in their books; in other words, if he attempts to make honest investigators and Freethinkers of them, how long will the church stand it? and how long will he retain his position? If he does not so instruct them how many of them are capable of doing any original thinking after they get through college?

The average college bred man seems to listen to the utterances of his professors, or the statements in his books, or the subsidized press, with the same reverence that the devout worshiper listens to the utterances of the minister, or language of his Bible. If you present some idea to him that disagrees with what he has been taught in college or in church, instead of meeting the question logically, he begins to quote from some of the aforementioned authorities to prove that you are wrong.

Last summer I attended the closing exercises of the Ohio State University, where I listened to a harangue an hour long by President Harper. It was nothing more nor less than an orthodox sermon, and while he did not take any text, the keynote to the whole discourse was, "Be slow to change." He repeated these words over and over, and returned to them again and again. It was the last opportunity he had to say anything to them, and he used every moment of time, and all the eloquence he could muster, to put the finishing touches on the brain-crippling process to which they had already been so long subjected. A thousand people listened with profound attention, as if his words were spiced with wisdom, and no doubt many people thought that they were, for the average mind can scarcely distinguish between sense and nonsense.

Religion is the worst enemy of thought, and the curse of this world is its thoughtless ignorance. The mass of humanity never think; they pattern after, and conform to, the ways of the world because it is too much trouble to think for themselves; and just as soon as one of their number does begin to reason and think, and to make use of his philosophy, his neighbors are positively certain that he is insane. Not far from where I live we have one of these crazy men whom I will call White. White follows no fashions; he thinks and acts for himself. Of course he differs greatly from most of his neighbors. His house is peculiar, and so of his dress, diet, and ideas; and his neighbors say he is crazy. Many of them habitually get so drunk that they cannot walk unassisted; others use so much tobacco that they ruin their hearts and so debilitate their systems that it is impossible for them to impart any healthy organization to their children, and are therefore only fit to be the parents of drunkards, criminals, or imbeciles. Many of them reduce the size of their waists to one half their normal proportions, and thus lay the foundation for a life of misery. They do all these foolish and injurious things, not because they have reasoned about them—they have no philosophy for their conduct, but they do so because they have not thought. They do so for the same reason that a dog barks—his father and mother barked. It never occurs to these people to call each other crazy; they do only what is customary, and whatever is customary is, of course, right. White has reasoned about all of these things and, as a result of that philosophy, he drinks only water and never is unable to walk. He uses no tobacco, and has a good constitution. His dress is of the simplest character, and he only wears clothes at all because they are a necessity. Of course White is insane.

Some of White's critics spend an hour a day on their knees, or eat meat six days in the week and abstain from it on one. Some of them eat messes that would all but draw the buzzards or poison a dog; they are always sick and doing something to keep themselves so, and are always drugging. They have no more philosophy for their conduct than a dog has for turning around before he lies down. It never occurs to them that they are doing anything unreasonable; they never think of calling each other insane. White has reasoned about all these things, and as a result he bows to no god, he eats neither meat nor salt, uses no medicines, and is never sick. Of course he is a lunatic.

The Spiritualists of this city celebrated the birthday of Thomas Paine. The Rev. Moses Hull delivered an eloquent address, contrasting the lives of Paine and Wesley, and reading numerous extracts from the works of both, which were, evidently, quite a revelation to many who were present, and who had never heard anything but slander about Paine. Although every minister in the city had been mailed a polite invitation and a free ticket, only the rabbi put in an appearance. Some of them, however, were heard telling the usual lies about Paine outside. One of them stated his intention of attending the meeting for the purpose of replying to Rev. Mr. Hull's address; but when promptly and earnestly requested to do so, he suddenly recollected that he had to attend a song service. Undoubtedly Spiritualism is making severe inroads on orthodox religion, and the ministers look upon it with no little alarm.

D. TAYLOR.

Mortuary—Dr. Albert W. James.

CINCINNATI, O., Feb. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Dr. Albert W. James, an able advocate of the doctrine of Liberal thought, was buried at Zaleski, O., Feb. 3d, the funeral, which was Secular, being largely attended.

Dr. James was widely known. He was a graduate in medicine of the University of Pennsylvania, and soon after his graduation, which took place in 1857, he settled at Zaleski, where he remained as a physician, building up an extensive practice that continued until his death, Feb. 1, 1895. For the last thirty years of his life he was an Agnostic, and his ripe scholarship, his familiarity with German and French as well as Latin, his ability as a physician, and his kindness of manner, endearing him to all whom he met, combined to lend weight to his opinions. He was a great reader of scientific works, and an admirer of such men as Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, and Haeckel.

Dr. James was deeply interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER, to which he had been a subscriber almost from its start and while it was yet published in Illinois. His youngest child, a daughter, Clelie, yet but a little girl, wrote a letter some weeks ago, which was published in the Children's Corner. He leaves a widow and seven sons and a daughter who follow in their father's footsteps. Instead of sending them to school, he taught them at home, in the English fashion, beginning with the eldest, who in turn became teacher of the next younger, and so on down the line. The wisdom of this course is seen in the result, as they are all intelligent, wide-awake, liberal-minded children, grown or growing up to stalwart manhood and womanhood. The oldest, Noel, was elected county clerk, receiving votes from members of all political parties. He has been a teacher for several years and has lately founded in Cincinnati a normal training school, which gives instruction by correspondence.

In accordance with the wishes of both Dr. James and his family, the funeral was devoid of religious ceremony. President George E. Light of the Ohio Liberal Society, Cincinnati, was requested by telegraph to provide a speaker, and he sent Editor E. P. Foster, of the Cincinnati, who was formerly a Presbyterian minister, but is now an officer of the Ohio Liberal Society. The services were held at the home of the deceased, a handsome residence in Zaleski, and the spacious house was filled to overflowing with relatives, friends, and neighbors.

Mr. Foster said in his discourse that funeral ceremonies were observed by all nations, ancient and modern. They sometimes took the form of offerings, prayers, or masses for the repose of the soul, or the supposed soul, but most of the modern churches, even, had now advanced beyond that idea. The future, at the best, is uncertain, but the present is certain. Pain and pleasure are living realities, and the briefness of life teaches us that if we would give happiness to one another as we journey along its pathway we must be about it speedily. It is in one sense no stranger that we should be alive in the future than that we are alive to-day, but science seems to teach that whatever begins must end, and that individuals are but passing manifestations of one great underlying life force. Men, brutes, plants, crystals, unorganized matter, even the planets and systems themselves, rise and fall, as one wave perpetually succeeds another in the boundless ocean of existence. In the mean time, while it is yet day, let us gather all that is possible of the sunshine of life for ourselves and for others. So taught Dr. James while living, as teaches every fair-minded, Liberal thinker, and so, being dead, his words that remain, and his example, yet teach. An Arabian proverb says, "All sunshine makes the desert," and even the sadness of bereavement may teach us the tender kindness and sympathy of life, and admonish us to brighten its pathway for one another, until we all, one by one, enter those portals from which there is no return.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Life—A Symbol.

We are given a berth
Aboard the ship called Earth,
Whose sails are set free
For the boundless sea.
And swiftly we glide
O'er the billowy tide,
While the star of the dawn
Gaily beckons us on.

Our morning is bright,
And our hearts are light;
Our sky is all clear
From the clouds of fear.
The woes that may assail,
Are hidden by a veil;
Close in the deep folds
The secret it holds.

Thus speed we away,
In the full light of day;
The glorious noon
We reach very soon—
The noon-time is gone,
And still we sail on,
But shadows now creep
O'er the murmuring deep.

And storms soon arise
That take us by surprise,
And the dread shark of Fate
Follows close in their wake.
We strive to press forward,
Though the winds are now froward;
And often-met gales
Hav ribbioned our sails.

The sun sinks apace
Beyond the watery waste.
And night comes on
With our bright star gone.
While the breaker's roar
We hear evermore—
And the shadowy land
Gives no helping hand.

Our ship's aground
It fast is bound;
We are doomed to abide
The slow coming tide
That bears us away
To that shoreless bay,
In whose still waters deep
We sink into sleep.

EMILY G. TAYLOR.

Marion Hepburn's Heresy.

After contemplating this advertisement for a few moments, Marion procured writing paper and began an answer to it.

After much difficulty the letter was written. But who was to recommend her? She knew of no one who could do so except her aunt, and how did she know whether people accepted the commendation of relatives? There was her school diploma, showing that she had been graduated at high school. She there mentioned her aunt as reference and the diploma as a recommendation.

"The diploma can't speak and say, 'I know this girl to be suitable and trustworthy,'" she said to herself; "but it can testify to the fact that I am supposed to know something, even if I have forgotten all I learned—which I haven't."

Putting on her hat and coat she went out, and with her heart beating with hope and expectation, dropped her letter into the nearest letter box. There was now a chance that she might be useful to some one, and be able to leave her aunt's house, where everything was not made comfortable and agreeable for her.

For two days hope trembled in her breast as the stars twinkle in the heavens, and on the third day the whistle of the postman announced a letter for her.

"O aunt," she exclaimed joyfully, after reading the letter, "I am to go and see the lady to-day—this afternoon. I do hope she won't say, 'You are not experienced nor matured enough to teach two children;'" and laughing gaily, she bounded out of the room and up stairs, to prepare for the afternoon appointment.

Not to waste words in describing the visit, when a few words will suffice, Marion's diploma and her refined, intellectual appearance won the day, and she was engaged at $30 a month. She was to live with the family and instruct the children in the first principles of a good education.

Two years, with their seasons, pleasures, as well as sorrows, quickly passed. No extraordinary event occurred to mar or quicken the interest in life of our young friend. The children were as good as children possibly could be, and the lessons taught were simple. Altogether Marion had a happy time, and almost as much leisure to herself as though she had been in her own home.

These two years were but the sunshine before the storm. No word about religion has ever passed between Miss Hepburn and the family with whom she was living. Her employers seemed to possess more than the average of common sense. They did not believe that children of eight and ten years of age were old enough to understand the importance of religion, if there is any importance to religion, and theirs were not sent to Sunday-school or church. The parents themselves frequented church, but they did not make it their business to inquire into the religious ideas of their young teacher.

As for the tutor, she was a Materialist. The dogmas of the Christian church (and it is really very hard to know which denomination is really the Christian church) did not possess for her any attraction. To her they were superstitions, every one. It is not necessary to believe in religion to understand morality; that is, Marion Hepburn thought so. She could not see the reason and justice of the doctrine of atonement—that by the death of one man all the sins of the world could be forgiven. How could the death of one man atone for the sins of every one, in the past, present, and future, when that man lived in but an infinitesimal part of time, represented but a minute portion of the human race—the Jews, who repudiate him, for Jesus was a Jew—and at the time of his death was known to only a few people? Surely, there is something strange about the doctrine of atonement, and only blind credulity and ignorance can see any justice, love, or mercy in it.

The idea that there really was no God, and could not possibly be, since the idea was of human origin, and people who first believed in a God were not very intellectual, appeared to her very sensible and practical. To echo the words some people used to refute Atheism—How can the finite mind know anything about the infinite? Therefore, what knowledge of God did the originators of the idea have on which to base their belief? Surely we can say no more than this, that they knew as much on the subject as a sleeping babe; and taking everything into consideration, there is no foundation or basis for the idea of God, and as little truth in it. That nothing could exist save in some material form, and that materiality is, in a general sense, the cause of everything, and that, therefore, without that matter, which makes consciousness possible, and without the physical and nervous systems life can not result and exist, then, when death has overtaken us, there can be no future life for anyone, was the best solution of the problem at which she could arrive.

That the universe always existed there can be no doubt, for the very idea that some one created it out of nothing is so absurd and preposterous as to provoke the laughter of those who have studied the question honestly and without prejudice. So she was a Materialist, not because she wanted to be odd, but for the reason that it seemed to be about as practical a theory of life, origin, and the universe as could be formulated.

Correspondence.

CORTLAND, O., Feb. 3, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will now write to you and the Cornerites.

I go to school; my teacher's name is Miss Alice M. Hardy; she is a good teacher. Mr. J. E. Remsburg delivered three lectures in Cortland, on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of November. Papa was in Warren Nov. 2 to hear Mr. Ingersoll lecture. I wish it was summer, so it would be pleasant.

Papa is going to Youngstown this afternoon. I correspond with Cora Lane and Surra M. Fenton; they write such good, bright letters. Yours truly,

CARRIE A. PARSONS.

[Will you please tell us something about the town of Cortland?—how old the place is; number of schools, churches, principal industries, etc.—ED. C. C.]

ORD, NEB., Jan. 1, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I have never written to the Corner, and so I took the chance this evening. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. We have several Freethought books, including "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

Ord is a town of about eighteen hundred inhabitants. There are three churches and six or seven kinds of religion in town. The Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Disciples, or the thorough-breds, as papa calls them, Episcopalians, Christian Scientists, and perhaps others. The Disciples came just last year. A preacher came from Missouri, and they held meetings. He had a question box, and anyone who wanted to could put in a question. My sister put in a few questions like these: "How do you know that the Bible is true?" He answered, "How do I know anything is true?" You see he just wanted to sneak out of it and, instead of answering, he asked us a question.

"Where did Cain get his wife?"
"At his father-in-law's house, I suppose."
"Where was Cain's father-in-law's house?"

"I don't know; I've never been there." Now, is not this a fine way for preachers to answer questions, when they pretend to be such wonderful creatures? If they tell you to ask questions, why don't they answer them with a little sense?

I am eleven years old, and go to school every day, and so does my brother and sisters. I would like to have some little boy or girl write to me, and I would gladly answer. Wishing the Corner success, I remain, Your Freethinking friend,

MARIE REITHARDT.

BOND, KAN., Feb. 4, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: As it has been quite a while since I have written to the Children's Corner, I will endeavor to write again.

There is a Baptist minister holding protracted meetings in our neighborhood, and he is doing his best to convert someone. And when he gets through there will be a United Brethren minister who will try his best, too.

Bond is just booming within the last nine months; it has erected a creamery, a mill, and a tannery. The creamery churns four times a week, and makes, on an average, one hundred pounds of butter each churning. A Fraternal Aid Society was organized and quite a number of the neighbors joined it. My mother always tries to celebrate Thomas Paine's birthday; and quite a number of the Liberals came to our house and we had a splendid time. We young people danced—as most young folks are fond of that—and the old folks played cards, and at twelve o'clock ate supper.

I go to school, and like to very well. I am in the eighth grade and study arithmetic, writing, physical geography, civil government, grammar, history, and spelling. My favorite study is arithmetic. Our teacher's name is Emma Ulrich.

I will close for this time, asking some of the Corner friends to write to me. A dress me at Bond, Kan.

Your Liberal friend,
TRACEY HILLSTROM.

[A girl, whose mother celebrates the birthday of Thomas Paine, cannot be otherwise than good and true, and a blessing to all who know her.—ED. C. C.]

PETERSBURG, IND., Feb. 1, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since my second letter was printed, and now I will try and write you again.

Mr. Remsburg gave three lectures here in the Opera House, Saturday the 12th, at night, and Sunday the 13th, in the afternoon and at night. There were not very many people to hear the lectures. One reason was that the weather was very cold. Another was the usual aversion the good, kind, Christ-like folks have to giving up control of society. This town is overflowing with persons who venerate any who "play-like," eat a man's flesh and drink human blood.

We have six churches, six saloons, and about 1,500 people in our town. Preachers and saloon keepers all believe in the Bible and follow their trade by its precepts. The preachers teach the young to take the name of their God in vain—praying to and advising him—so that when they grow up they can curse, swear, and get drunk, which gives excuse for a preacher to tinker them up ready for heaven before or after they die. A young man was in jail here for running a rabbit on a Sunday; and, poor fellow, he did not get the rabbit either. A preacher tried to prosecute a man for cutting ice on Sunday, which shows how much poison is under his fangs. From your Freethinker friend,

ESTELLA WEAVER.

[It is pleasing to note the improvement in penmanship and composition in our letter-writers. We remember Estella's first letter to the Corner, and we hope this will not be the last.—ED. C. C.]

COLUMBIAS FOR 1895.

A Highly Artistic Catalogue Sets Forth the Merits of these Famous Bicycles.

Noted artists occasionally condescend to lend their aid to make a trade catalogue beautiful, and this has evidently been the case with the new handbook of Columbia bicycles, just issued. From the rich and striking cover to the last of the dainty sketches that adorn the broad margins, the tell-tale marks that show the hand of well-known contributors to Life, Vogue, and the leading magazines are everywhere apparent. The idea skillfully carried out in the illustrations is that of sport and travel. The book will long be preserved as one of the handsomest art works of the year. It is as little like the ordinary trade catalogue as well can be, and yet it cleverly tells of the merits of Columbia bicycles for 1895, and also of lower-priced machines, Hartfords. No lover of bicycling or of beautiful books should neglect sending for the Columbia Catalogue. It can be had by calling upon Columbia agents, or it will be sent by mail for two 2-cent stamps. THE BOTTOMLESS PIT: A Discursive Treatise on Eternal Torment. By W. Stewart Ross (Saladin). London: W. Stewart & Co. Cloth, 12mo., 224 pp. Price, $1.25.

All our readers are familiar with the work of the stalwart warrior of Free-thought, the knightly Saladin, whose flashing blade of keenest edge and irresistible swing and rush cuts clean through helmet and hauberk of superstition and cruelty to the very heart of God-serving and man-hating tyranny. This priest-despising Scot is oftentimes as weird and eerie as the most mystical of his countrymen, but he is always interesting and entertaining, even when one is compelled to dissent from his conclusions, and when he is dealing his terrible blows against the atrocious dogmas of the fearful Christian creed we can but be borne away on the mounting wings of his illuminating imagination, and share with him his fierce hatred of the awful theological system that has cursed the human family as no other religion of which we have a record has done.

In "The Bottomless Pit" Saladin has poured out the emotions of his heart as in perhaps no other of his works. He has felt the scorching heat of the hell whose flames he is doing no little to extinguish in the waters of reason and mercy and he has determined that the savage doctrines of the Christian church shall receive no quarter from him while strength is left in his arm to hew and thrust. Here is a striking passage from Chapter II:

"At the stake the victim was asked, 'In what faith will you die?' If he replied, 'The Catholic,' he was, in sarcastic mercy, strangled before he was burned. If he did not reply, 'The Catholic,' the loving-kindness of strangulation was denied him, and, in the presence of priests, roughs, artisans, nobles, ladies, and even kings, the heretic stood till the fire had burned away—and, with its feet in a heap of hot ashes, a blackened and undistinguishable human cinder stood, lashed up to the stake by an iron chain. The chain was unloosed, the erect cinder fell down among the other cinders and ashes, and the crowd dispersed. Another heretic had been dispatched to endless torment, another service had been done for Jesus; at least, through all the sword and flame of the terrible centuries, Jesus never indicated that the service done in his name and for his glory was one he did not appreciate; the voice of eternal Benevolence was dumb, the hand of everlasting Omnipotence was unlifted."

Here is another picture of religious "love," and the source of this all-consuming affection is truthfully traced. From Chapter IX:

"He that believeth not," etc., was a statement so explicit and on such inexpugnable authority that the extirpation of those who should tend to shake the belief of the orthodox became the foremost and most imperative of duties. Believe this statement, and the better man you are, the more merciless persecutor you will be. Buckle has corroborated the testimony of Llorente, that the most terrible of the persecutors, Torquemada included, were, in themselves, humane and kind-hearted men; but they believed in the doctrines of their scriptures and church, and consequently, when heresy was under judgment, deemed it their duty to God and man to steel their hearts against every human emotion, and to become merciless as the she-wolf from whose dugs her young had been torn away. The crime lay not with the inquisitors and torturers; it lay with those who forged writings which they alleged to be of divine origin—it lay with the Church that, in maintenance of her own dominancy, perpetuated and enforced the fiendish corollary of the written fraud.

"Consequently, as I have said, Papist and Protestant alike persecuted in proportion to their respective influences. For the stake and rack were on both sides at the disposal of strong and earnest men—souls capable of the direst renunciation and sacrifice, and prepared, at the call of what they felt certain was duty, to make earth an Aceldama of gore and groans, and that heaven might be an Elysium of gold and glory. In England here we have been fed full of horrors on the recital of the persecutions by the Papists; and the ordinary Protestant in the street holds persecution to be a trait of the hated Romish Church, and is unaware that his Church ever persecuted at all. The prolonged and gallant struggle of the Scottish Covenanters was not against Papists, but against their fellow Protestants. It was a Protestant hammer that drove the wedges down upon the splintered bones of Hugh McKail; it was Protestant murder that, in front of his own doorstep, scattered the brains of John Brown of Priesthill. They were Protestant hands that tore the body of Alexander Peden from the grave. These fierce blades

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Free-thought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

at Bothwell are in Protestant hands, and, from point to hilt, they are red with Protestant blood. The mad and miserable hundreds in Greyfriars churchyard are Protestants, and it is a hedge of Protestant muskets that keeps them there. The Crown that goes down into the churned fury of the deep, gored to ruin on the rock horns of the Orkneys, is filled with Protestants, shipped off by other Protestants to be sold in the Indies as slaves. Protestant voices sing that death-psalm till the sea closes and roars over the psalm and the singer.

The John Calvin was no Papist who, in order to prolong his agony, caused Michael Servetus to be slowly roasted to death. In Holland a man who had already been scorched, racked, and partly flayed is trailed across the floor of the dungeon out into the light, that other horrors might be perpetrated for the purpose of inducing him to take a certain view of certain doctrinal points—one more attempt to bring him properly to him who said, 'He that believeth not shall be damned.' The man, back downwards, was firmly secured to the floor. Then, on his naked abdomen, was placed an inverted metal vessel containing under it a number of rats. On the bottom uppermost of this basin live coals were heaped till the rats underneath, to escape being roasted alive, tore their way through the man's flesh into the cavity of his body to find refuge among his intestines. The basin was removed, and fiery cinders were thrust into the holes in the flesh through which the rats had torn their way. They had put rats into him; but, even yet, they had failed to put into him the true conception of Jesus. He who applied the heated basin and the rats was Dietrich Sonnoy, a Protestant; he who had the heated basin and the rats applied to him was Nanning Koppezoen, a Papist. As far as I am aware, rat-in-the-bowels is an exclusively Protestant argument to bring the sinner to God."

Pathos, wit, indignation, and humor mingle and contrast in "The Bottomless Pit," and he who begins it is not very likely to lay it down until the last page is reached. There is an excellent demand for Saladin's works in the United States and Canada, and we are quite safe in predicting that the one here noticed will be equally welcomed with its predecessors in the homes of American Freethinkers.

In our issue for February 9th we stated that the price of "Marriage and Divorce" (Philadelphia: John E. Porter & Company) is $3.50. This was a mistake; the price of the book is only $1.50, which makes it a very cheap volume.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address, F. J. Something
QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE
BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dived into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

"Do you know much about that horse you bought from the deacon?" "I know more about the deacon than I did."—Life.

We all have here our work to do,
If we'd be worthy of our hire;
For some must watch, while some must pray—
The fighting we do in the choir.

FOND MOTHER: "Clarence, didn't I overhear you praying at bed-time for God to keep Willy Wiggles from harm during the night?" Little Clarence: "Yep! I wanted him spared, so's I could lick the stuffin' out of him to-day."—Puck.

LITTLE REGIE: "I don't b'lieve the Lord cares a cent for good boys." Fond mother: "Horror! What put that idea into your head?" Little Reggie: "He hardly ever makes good boys strong enough to lick bad boys."—Good News.

CLERGYMAN (to hotel clerk): "What do you charge a day?" Clerk: "Three dollars." Clergyman: "You have rates for clergymen, of course?" "Oh, yes, sir." Clergyman: "How much are they?" Clerk: "Three dollars."—Boston Courier.

SISTER BECKY: "Fo' de Lord, pawson, dis watah is 'noui to freeze one to deaf!" The parson (reprovingly): "Hab you no fish in yo' heart?" Sister Becky: "Yes, pawson; dere's fish enough in mah heart, but it's de flesh an' bones dat feels de cold!"—Puck.

STRANGER: "You say religion has never entered into politics in this town?" Boss: "No, sor; an' we don't intend to let it." "A wise resolve, my friend." "Yis, sor. Kapin' religion out av politics is aisy enough, sor." "How do you manage?" "Sure, all the candidates do be av wan religion."—Puck.

AUNT (poetically): "Ah, what is more beautiful, more sublime, than the tolling of the church bells upon a Sabbath morning! What happy thoughts it brings us!" Nephew (practical): "You bet it does, aunt! Just as soon as a fellow hears them he knows that it's Sunday, and he can turn over and sleep all day if he wants to."—Puck.

An old Welsh tailor being sued by the rector for tithes, and being told these were for preaching in church, said, "I've nothing to give thee, for I never come to hear thee." "Oh, but you could come whenever you like," said the rector, "the doors are always open." Next day the parson threatened further proceedings, whereupon the tailor took him a bill for forty shillings. "For what do I owe you this money?" "For tailoring." "For tailoring!" exclaimed the rector, "why, I never was tailored by you in my life." "Oh, but thou might'st have come and been tailored any day thou did'st like, for my doors, like thine, are always open."—Exchange.

MISS FREAM AS A PHILANTHROPIST.

Church Property

in the United States.

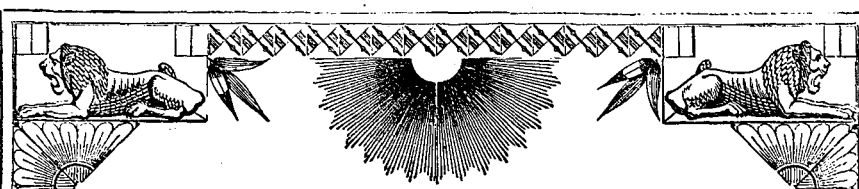

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies, $1.00
Fifty copies, 4.50
One hundred copies, 8.00

devising plans for making other people think as he does.

This is the central fact of Miss Fream's public career, and it was wholly ignored by the police inspector who lightly asked her why she does not take life as she finds it and enjoy herself.

Those who take life as they find it and enjoy it are called "Hedonists" in dictionary English. Miss Fream is not a Hedonist but a philanthropist. Instead of trying to make it pleasant for the little vagrom boys whose salvation she is seeking she means to have the last one of them locked up if it takes the entire police force to do it. And with them the push-cart men, the saloon-keepers, the wienerwurst and pretzel pedlars, and all other publicans and sinners who are not good enough to be at large.

Feeling that it is absolutely necessary to have sinners locked up as a means of improving them, Miss Fream is willing to take charge of the government of New York city, or even of the entire continent, if it is necessary for the accomplishment of her philanthropic purposes.

She feels that she would be false to herself and to her mission if she wilfully allowed any unrepentant sinner to go at large. Hence she spends her Sundays in begging the police to lock up the unregenerate, and they show a very low idea of her mission when they invite her to take things easy and enjoy herself. She could not do that if she tried. She is in the world for its improvement, and not for her own pleasure or that of any one else. The lagging rate at which this world grows better is perhaps due in part to the fact that this pertinacious woman is a typical off-hand compulsory reformer.—New York World.

Gems of Thought.

THE banished of the church are always its best blood; they are in advance of their times.

WHEN you have chosen your part abide by it, and do not weakly try to reconcile yourself with the world.—Emerson.

THOSE who are fiercest to destroy and hang their fellow-men for having committed crimes, are, for the most part, at heart, criminals themselves.—Ingersoll.

NOT only harmony of coöperation in the social state, but also efficiency of coöperation, is best achieved by conformity to the law of equal freedom.—Herbert Spencer.

IT is equally true that all cannot remain politically free if all are not economically free. Political freedom is but the first installment of economic freedom.—Henry D. Lloyd.

WE need no Christian rule of political right; we need only one which is rational, just, human. The right, the true, the good, has always its ground of sacredness in itself, in its quality.—Feuerbach.

THE agitator must stand outside of organizations, with no bread to earn, no candidate to elect, no party to save, no object but truth—to tear a question open and riddle it with light.—Wendell Phillips.

IT would, indeed, fare badly with morals if they had no other than a supernatural basis; if men were not subject to physiological penalties; if their conduct were visible only to a supernatural eye; if they had not, in fact, the inherent and inherited morality of a million years.—Furneaux Jordan.

IT is a current philosophy that a thousand fools working in division must always remain a thousand fools, but that a thousand fools co-operating are magically transformed into a thousand-leaved volume of prophecy. It is comfortable arithmetic. But it is the sort of figuring that always winds up in ciphers.—Horace L. Traubel.

IT is proposed by some to introduce the military into our public schools. This proposition should be rebuked by the truly civilized among us. What do we want of the coarse and brutalizing influences of the military in our schools? We should try to get the savage out of us, rather than train it into us.—Progressive Age.

BEAUTY is real; it is that which alone is permanent and visible; it lurks behind a thousand masks and distorted countenances, ever struggling to body itself forth; it is the manifestation of potent and mysterious natural laws, which but for it would remain forever hidden from us. Its proud power is to awaken Love with all her joyous train; and Love means the unconscious attraction of the Ideal, the noblest incitement to human endeavor.—Daniel G. Brinlon.

I THINK it probable that Whitman anticipated a long period of comparative oblivion for himself and his works. He knew from the first that the public would not be with him; he knew that the censors of taste, the critics and literary professors, would not be with him; he knew the vast army of Philistia, the respectable, orthodox church-going crowd, would be against him, and that, as in the case of nearly all original, first-class men, he would have to wait to be understood for the growth of the taste of himself.—John Burroughs.

WE must see to it that religion is kept out of politics if our institutions are to be maintained. When the civil law gives protection to every person to worship as his or her conscience dictates, it has accomplished its purpose, as far as religion is concerned; but whenever through secret organizations one sect or community of sects, attempts to deprive those of other religious belief, or of no religion, of an equal participation in the management of civil affairs, either as sovereigns at the polls, or servants of the people, then it is time that lovers of our free institutions branded it with the stamp of their unqualified condemnation.—Denison Gazetteer.

AS the moral sentiment when educated makes a nation's greatness, when ignorant it becomes a nation's weakness. All history has shown that when oppression has been foisted on every other side, its last resort is to alarm the moral sentiment of the masses, to confuse their common sense with black specters of immorality. In that fear, that confusion, selfish power has often found a community's vulnerable heel, and there planted its fang. We can see through such masks in the past; we can recognize in many massacres which pretended to defend virtue the concealed hand of vice; but, alas! the lessons of history are not yet wisdom for the people, and the old device may still, it seems, be tried with success.—Moncure D. Conway.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

"A Revival of Dogma."

At first thought no fairly intelligent person would be supposed to desire the return of the age of dogmatic theology. The darkest chapters in human history are those which record the terrible doings of people crazed with the vain imaginings of the creed-makers. The millions of our fellows who in Christian lands died in unutterable agony at the hands of priests or of civil officials under the influence of priests were the victims of religious dogma. They died to save the souls of others from the hell of theology, died because the priest taught that he who doubted was damned and, causing his neighbors to doubt, caused them also to be damned. The world has had more than enough of dogma. A dogma is a positiv assertion concerning something of which nobody knows anything. Dogma is the affirmation of ignorance. The theologian holds that he who is so modest that he is willing to say "I don't know" is desperately depraved and is fit only for the flames of eternal torture.

The Boston Congregationalist thinks that it sees indications of a revival of dogma, and it rejoices greatly thereat. Let us hope that the only basis for the thought was the wish of the editor. He says: "Social relations are stable only when conscience rules, and conscience is without authority unless it can appeal to God." But conscience is not the voice of God; go back so far as you can and you come not to God or gods; you find only men and their conceptions of human relations; conscience is the voice of heredity and education. Again: "Wherever men are interested in living aright they want to know about God, and they want what is known of God stated in terms which they can understand." In other words, men too indolent to think or otherwise incapable of doing so, want what men no wiser than themselves have guessed about gods and devils, "stated in terms which they can understand," that is, they want cut-and-dried answers to questions to which no scientific affirmativ answer is possible. Theology has always thriven on this credulous receptivity of the masses. Scientific education is the enemy of dogma, and hence the one thing needful to prevent a revival of dogma is the spread of such education. This is why theology has ever fought against science and genuin instruction. Once more: "They want to know what evidences there are that he has made revelations to men and what are those revelations." If that was really what they wanted they would leave dogmas alone and study the Bible and history and criticism and science with the purpose of getting at the facts. Unfortunately, all they want is a bundle of dogmas embodying what certain other men say was revealed, with some very positiv assurances that there was actually such a revelation. The next sentence of the Congregationalist's article tells the story in few but pregnant words: "They hunger to believe and welcome authoritativ statements of faith." That is it, and that is the secret of the success of theology; once let the people generally begin the search for truth regardless of preconceived opinions and inherited desires, and the reign of the priest nears its end. This is why preists sigh for a revival of dogma; for them there are already too many men and women who do not "long to believe and welcome authoritativ statements of faith."

The Congregationalist tries to assure itself that the people are "growing weary of critical discussions of religious themes"; that "they are coming to listen eagerly for the utterance that is positiv, that rings with the fervor of belief in God, holy and supreme, offering pardon to lost sinners through Jesus Christ his son." The Boston paper must have a very low opinion of the intelligence of the people of America and of the world if it believes that they are ready to go back into the midnight of the grossest superstition that ever cursed a civilized race. Does it really think that in this age of Evolution the faith of the people in the childish tale of the creation and fall of man, and the silly story that a part of God, that was procreated by another part, was murdered at the instigation of still another part that whosoever should believe the marvelous lie should escape eternal death, while all who could not believe would be tortured forever by the loving moiety of God that did the son-murdering act over there in Palestine—we ask, does the Boston editor believe that the faith of the people in this incredible invention is to become stronger in this era of science, this age of inductiv reasoning? It would seem so, for he gravely says that he "confidently expects a revival of dogma."

"Renewed interest in God and men's relations to him and in human destiny, cannot fail to strengthen the fellowship as well as advance the knowledge of those who believe and obey him." But what is to be the fate of those who cannot believe in him, and are therefore unable to obey him? Will their lot be any easier than was that of their prototypes who were martyred in the centuries when the power of dogma was at its zenith? And not only those who cannot believe, but those whose belief varies by but a hair's-breadth from that of the dominant theologians, will have a hard time of it when Dogma sits once more on the world's throne. "Fellowship" was at a discount when Catholics were murdering Protestants, Protestants murdering Catholics and each other, and both classes torturing and slaughtering "witches" and Infidels. And "knowledge"? There was very little of it in those days of Dogma's iron rule, but there was any amount of faith and superstition. Is it possible that the Congregationalist wants to revive the Dark Ages? If not, does it believe it could have an age of dogma and not have at the same time an age of persecution? Like causes produce like results, and an intense faith in the doctrine of exclusive salvation inevitably leads to the establishment of an inquisition.

"With the revival of dogma will come a revival of faith, hope and love." Yes, of faith, but if you would know something of the "hope" and "love" inspired by the supremacy of dogma read White's

"Warfare of Science" and Saladin's "Bottomless Pit."

The Governor and the Preachers.

Some weeks since we gave a summary of an answer made by Governor Fishback of Arkansas to the preachers of Little Rock, who had taken him to task in characteristic ministerial style for something he had said regarding the social evil and the proper way to deal with it. His letter aroused the preachers to a pitch of frenzy rarely seen except in that highly inflammable class, and they have been telling all sorts of stories about him and his beliefs. Their assertions hav called out another communication from the belligerent governor, which we find in the Arkansas Gazette, of Little Rock, of Jan. 21. In it he says that he might summarily dispose of the statements of the divines by branding them as falsehoods, but as he "feels disposed to do a little missionary work among certain fanatics," he avails himself of the opportunity to discuss the subject at length.

It is clear that Governor Fishback is a very firm believer in Christianity and its power to finally regenerate humanity, and it is this faith in the divine mission of the church that makes his cutting and weighty criticisms of the churches as represented by the ministers of more than usual interest and moment. He does not believe that men and women can be made religious and virtuous by law, but he is sure that Christianity will accomplish these results by filling the heart with love for God and our fellows. So long as the governor is opposed to persecution and savage penal statutes we can forgive him for his belief in the efficacy of a religion that has always made men the persecutors of their brethren in the degree that they have loved the god of Christianity, but we can not have much respect for his powers of discrimination and analysis. He may come to see some day though, if the ministers continue to spur him into intellectual activity, that the sexual vice and crime which are such prominent and painful features of Christian society, have been augmented rather than diminished by the ascetic and anti-natural teachings of the church through all the centuries of its existence. If Governor Fishback could be induced to carefully read Mrs. Gage's "Woman, Church and State," it is not improbable that he would revise his high opinion of the regenerating influence of Christianity as it has affected woman in all her relations, for it is evident that he has considerable capacity for independent thinking.

After narrating the experience of Berlin in its efforts to expel or control the social evil, and reproducing the short note which first aroused the ire of the ministers, Governor Fishback quotes at length from an article written by Rev. John Snyder of St. Louis. This article was called out by the Fishback-preacher controversy, and contains much that is true concerning the training and attitude of the average clergyman. Mr. Snyder says that "it is the noisy, empty, superficial, over-zealous members of the profession who are apt to push themselves to the front in every movement of social reform, and as they have but one test by which to measure all social questions, wiser and more thoughtful men are honestly reluctant to oppose them, lest they should seem to be fighting the interests of pure morality." We knew that these were the ministers who were always seen at the front in legal moralistic and religious crusades, but we had been so uncharitable as to harbor the suspicion that the reason they had the monopoly of this kind of business was because there was no other class of orthodox ministers.

Mr. Snyder is entirely right in thinking that mental arrogance is one of the besetting sins of the minister. He attributes its prevalence to the fact that the utterances of preachers are rarely "contradicted or wholesomely criticised." The congregations are much more likely to sleep under sermons than to subject them to searching logical examination. We opine that if they did the latter there would soon be about one hundred thousand clergymen looking for a new occupation. While, as Kipling says, the young puppy is soon taught that it is not safe to bite the ear of the older dogs, and the young lawyer is early snubbed into sensibility and quits talking nonsense in the court room, the young preacher breathes an atmosphere made poisonous by flattery. He is treated with a delicate deference that is often mistaken and hurtful. There is a well-simulated pretense of accepting his opinions, and thus he lives in a false position. He is apt to grow up "narrow, arrogant, dogmatic, partisan, and nobody corrects the mental habits which are fatal to true intellectual growth." The St. Louis clergyman thinks that it is probable that in every church in the country "there are men who know that their pastor's views of doctrine, of sociology, of Biblical criticism, will not stand the test of rigid examination, and yet they are kept silent by those unwise traditions that govern man's relations to the ministry." Perhaps Mr. Snyder forgets that it is dangerous to criticise, in the church, even in the most mild and courteous manner, the deliverances from the pulpit. Such criticism is held by the law to be a "disturbance of religious worship." The minister jealously guards the immunity thus granted to him; he knows that it is his only security. If his congregation were given the opportunity, at the close of the sermon, to ask questions, as is the audience of the Freethought lecturer, the church would very soon be in a shaky condition indeed.

Governor Fishback applies the moral drawn from the observations of Rev. Mr. Snyder to the clergymen of Little Rock in a way that is the reverse of complimentary to the latter. He shows that they are either densely ignorant concerning the social matters about which they assume the exclusive right to speak authoritatively, or else they are guilty of what "in a preacher of the gospel is infinitely worse than even the intensest ignorance." That this fanaticism which refuses to deal with things as they are is beyond the reach of reason, the governor is well aware, and he perceives that it has retarded the "healthy growth alike of morality and religion, in all ages and in every clime." That religion is itself this retarding and reactionary force he seems to have failed to understand, and this blindness is what puzzles us; it would appear that a man so clear-headed as he is should be able to grasp the truth that those who believe in a revealed religion and a revealed morality are logically estopped from looking any further for the laws of social relations. If God has revealed his will in the Bible, there is where we will find all the rules we need for our guidance, and to study nature and society is rank treason to God. This is what the priesthood has always thought and taught, and this is what makes the Little Rock ministers impervious to reason and common sense; this is what leads them to scornfully reject the lessons of human experience. They have revealed truth, and that should end all discussion. Cannot Governor Fishback see this? He says that this clerical spirit against which he is contending is "incapable of recognizing fitness. It never reasons, but asserts." Of course; what else is to be expected from men who are the interpreters of the divine law? It is not for them to reason, but to declare. It is not for Governor Fishback to criticise, but to accept. These men have been sent out to preach the gospel; they know, with Paul, that he who preaches any other gospel shall be accursed, and they agree with John that he who comes with any other doctrine should be turned out into the night and the wilderness.

Finally, Governor Fishback hopes that he has been able to arouse some intelligent ministers to the danger of allowing Christianity to fall into the unreasoning control of the fanatics. When has it not been under such control? The fact is, a few wide awake men in the church are trying, as some have tried in almost every age, to preserve the name of Christianity while repudiating nearly all the principles and rules of action that establish the doctrinal and historical identity of Christianity. The place for the reformer is outside of the church. There he can think and breathe freely, and there he need not stultify himself.

Are Sunday Laws Necessary to Secure "Rest"?

We were long ago thoroughly convinced that all that is required to bring about the repeal of the existing Sunday statutes is the education of the masses of the people so that they can see that it is not necessary to their comfort that these statutes be retained. The stale theological arguments cannot avail against the common sense of the people, once it is shown to them that the repeal of the Sunday laws will not lead to their industrial oppression. It is the perception of this fact that has caused us to dwell so often and at such length on the "rest" feature of the Sunday problem. No doubt the subject has grown rather monotonous to some of our readers, but they should bear in mind that every day new names are added to our subscription lists and that the people at large, to whom great numbers of sample copies are sent, are as yet uninformed in regard to this matter. It takes years to din the most simple truths into the heads of the majority of the people—it must be line upon line, precept upon precept, week after week, year after year. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the only paper in the United States that has taken hold of this educational question in a systematic way, and effectually answered all the practical objections to the Free Sunday. Mere denunciation of the preachers for their zeal in behalf of Sunday laws is not all that the exigencies of the conflict require; we have to explain the origin of the week and of Sabbaths, and make it clear to the common folk that the abrogation of all Sunday statutes will not put them more at the mercy of employers, but, on the contrary, will make life better worth the living. This is a utilitarian age, and to do good work for liberty and humanity we cannot afford to disregard utilitarian arguments and considerations. That the "rest" pretense is the only really dangerous weapon in the hand of the Sabbatarian we receive fresh evidence every day. Recently in talking with a Freethinking woman, who is not a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Sunday question came up and she expressed the fear that the repeal of Sabbath laws would give corporations the power to exact from their work-people seven days of service for six days' pay. Yesterday we received from a friend in the South a letter which contained these questions:

"If it is not threshing old straw, I wish you'd explain in your columns why the present 'sacredness' of Sunday is not a boon to the laboring man; and why, if Sunday [laws] were abolished, the labor exploiters would refrain from exploiting on that day. I believe in a Free Sunday, but think that employers now close up on that day simply out of deference to the church. If we take that day from the church what is to prevent the employers from working us six [seven?] days in the week? The only 'bluff' at that explanation that I've noticed from our side is that we can take our labor elsewhere, or refuse to work Sundays; but that is like saying that we are free to work, or starve. How about it?"

It is "threshing old straw," but that is what the reform newspaper must do. Certainly the "present sacredness of Sunday" is not a boon to the laboring man. Until quite recently it has closed against him on his day of leisure, in such Puritan countries as England, Scotland, and the United States, art galleries, museums, libraries, theaters, and other places of instruction and entertainment. Every Sunday enjoyment so far won for him has been won in the face of the most determined opposition on the part of the day worshipers. If those who believe in the sacredness of Sunday could have their way there would be no place where the laboring man could spend that day save in the close and stifling quarters of his city home. When Schenley Park was opened in Pittsburg last summer and the daily attendance was 75,000 or more the theocratic preachers and editors of that city and Allegheny grew frantic as they talked of the "desecration" of the Sabbath, and hypocritically bemoaned the fate of the poor laboring man whose rest day was menaced by the opportunity given him to take his family and spend a portion of the first day of the week in the pure air and in enjoyment of the beauties of nature and art. The same pretense of interest in the fate of the working people was made in this city when Mr. S. P. Putnam and the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and later the great dailies demanded the Sunday opening of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in Central Park. At last common sense and liberty won, and now who but the most incorrigible bigots would go back to the old order of things?

Come with us to the Museum on Sunday and see the swarming multitudes of the "common people" who throng through its galleries, and tell us if the laborer has been injured by this smashing of the venerable superstition of the "sacredness of Sunday." Stand with us on a summer Sunday in the upper part of New York along the Harlem and see the hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children of the masses who go out on the cable, horse car, electric, and elevated lines to Fort George, Van Cortland, Bronx, and the other northern parks; call to your mind the fact that we have in this state an organization which is pledged to do all that it can to lock the wheels of every one of these cars on Sunday, and then say, if you can, that these Sabbatarians are really actuated by a laudable desire to secure a day of rest for labor. Go to Coney Island and the other seaside resorts of this city; go to Crescent and Nantasket Beaches, to Nahant, to Swamscott, and other breathing places in the vicinity of Boston, and you will learn the same lesson that was taught in Harlem. Go to the Public Garden and the Common of Boston and when there reflect that it cost a struggle to open them to the people on the priest's day, and then measure the degree of sincerity of the "rest" plea of the Sabbatarians. How many of the wage laborers have the leisure on the six working days of the week to spend any time in the libraries? And yet the Sabbatarians bitterly oppose the Sunday opening of libraries, all in the interest of the dear laborer, of course. Boston's public library is open on Sunday, but the Astor and other libraries of this city are closed; who doubts that it is the Sunday sacredness fetish that thus curtails the opportunities of the masses to improve their minds? Sunday amusements are illegal in most of the states, the law makers having gone so far in Arkansas as to make it a misdemeanor for a man to play a game of cards with his wife in his own house on that day, and if the bill lately introduced in the Missouri Senate becomes a law the same state of affairs will prevail in that state. Similar laws are on the statute books of other commonwealths.

Thus we see that it is the determination of the Sundayites to absolutely stop all secular use of the first day of the week, either for productive purposes or for amusement. They say that Sunday transportation, assorting and delivery of the mails must cease; that Congress shall put the brakes on interstate commerce and travel; that the Sunday newspaper must become a thing of the past; that the street cars must remain in their stables on Sunday, the news stands be closed, the bootblacks stop at home, the bands leave the parks, the theaters and opera houses lock their doors, the galleries, museums and libraries shut out their eager visitors, all games be forbidden, all labor outlawed. And the day is thus to be given over to the church in order that the corporations may not oppress their employees! What a sham! The laborer is to be placed between the upper and nether millstones of the corporations and the church and told to be happy!

It must at once be apparent to our questioners that the people could not be said to rest, in any legitimate sense of the word, if they were not permitted to use their leisure time in such manner as they individually preferred. True rest is not merely cessation from toil; it is such use of one's faculties as is agreeable to the person himself. It is self-evident that the great majority of the population, particularly of the large cities, cannot employ their leisure in a manner either pleasant or instructive if a considerable minority are not engaged in work on Sunday. Travel, entertainments, open parks, the nourishment and care of the body, the improvement of the mind, the enjoyment of the delights of art, and of nature as well, necessitate the employment of a small army of people on Sunday. So far as the individual workers are concerned, those who are their own wage payers—a class which includes many of the newsdealers, the sellers of confectionery and notions, the street venders, the keepers of bath houses, and a large number of dealers in miscellaneous articles, the ability to procure which when out in the parks or on the way, adds so much to the pleasure of the people—so far as this class is concerned, we say, there is no hardship in being able to pursue their vocations on Sunday. In fact, Sunday is their best day, and it is looked forward to eagerly by very large numbers of these men and women of small means as the day which they hope will do something to put them on the right side of the world after a week of bad trade. They are eager for the chance to make use of the occasion; as for rest, they will have more time for that when their Sunday customers are at work.

It is time that the wage-worker awakened to the fact that the Sundayites cannot do anything for him by the enactment of laws forbidding him to labor or play on some particular day. We shall have a free Sunday when he gets tired of listening to their disingenuous talk about "rest" for him. The comfort and convenience of the people call for considerable Sunday work and the only problem before us is one of adjustment. If the employees of transportation lines are wise they will keep aloof from the Sabbatarians and work out their own salvation in the ways that do not deny liberty. Inasmuch as many of the employees of railways are paid by the miles run instead of by time their wages will not be decreased, per hour, by the repeal of Sunday laws. Workmen on each division can easily arrange among themselves, with the concurrence of the companies, such a apportionment of time as will permit each man to have a certain day for rest, and the relays can so overlap each other that the day off of A will this week be the one that B had last week, and so on through the alphabet and to the end of the week. To get one day for rest in each seven it is not necessary to make Sunday labor a misdemeanor or crime, for it is neither, and it is utterly demoralizing to the moral nature of man to attempt to make it an offense against the law. We understand that the employees of some car lines in the cities have found the plan outlined above to work admirably. The relay system can be applied in all departments of Sunday activity where wage-workers are employed; all that is needed is the desire to preserve Sunday for the use of the whole people instead of setting it apart for the exclusive benefit of the clergy. As a large proportion of the employees of corporations are paid by the day it will not affect their wages for the cars to run on Sunday; they will not have to work seven days for six days' wages. Besides this, laboring men should be able to see that if all suburban Sunday travel could be stopped their aggregate pay would be greatly lessened, just as, if the Sunday paper can be killed, the total earnings of compositors, stereotypers, pressmen, workers in paper mills, in ink factories, in type foundries, and in all other places where the materials that enter into the production of the Sunday paper are made, will be immensely reduced.

We do not think that any law is needed to secure the adoption of the six-relay system in industries that public convenience requires should be carried on on Sunday; it ought to be very easy for the unions and the companies to amicably arrange the details of the system once the men are educated to the point of admitting the equity and necessity of the plan. But if any statute is deemed to be called for by the objections of some of the companies all that is needed is a general provision that six days shall constitute a week's work, leaving to the employers and employees in each instance the working out of the details, as the particular necessities of that line demand. It is not at all probable that ordinary manufacturing will be engaged in more than six days of the week; it has become a settled custom for the gates to close on Saturday night and remain closed until Monday morning, and there is no pressing demand for them to be opened on Sunday for the convenience of the general public as there is for the running of trains and the performance of the other kinds of Sunday work which we have specified. Of course there are some industries that are continued right along from one week to another for months or perhaps for years, the stoppage of which on Sunday would entail great loss. But the abrogation of the Sunday law would make no difference in these instances.

It should again be brought to the notice of inquirers that it is not a misdemeanor to work on secular holidays, such as the Fourth of July, Decoration Day or New Year's, and yet there is a general cessation of labor on those days. The Adventist farmer or carpenter is not sent to jail or the chain gang if he works on the Fourth of July, and we have not heard a single priest clamoring for a law to punish him for "desecrating" our natal day, and then pretending that he wants that law so that the poor wage-worker will not be ground down by the ruthless corporations! If, as it is so strenuously insisted by the preachers, it is imperatively necessary to the protection of the wage worker that all kinds of labor and recreation on Sunday be made misdemeanors or crimes, why is it not equally necessary for his protection that all kinds of labor and recreation on the secular holidays be made misdemeanors or crimes? The question reveals the hypocrisy of the "rest" argument of the Sabbatarians. Work and play on the secular holidays are not made misdemeanors or crimes for the simple reason that those days are set apart for the enjoyment of the people, and in order that they may get the full benefit derivable from such periods, it is necessary that a certain number of the people work while the others rest and play. There is no ministerial interference with the "moral" recreations and the labors of men and women on the secular holidays unless those days fall on Sunday, when, lo! and behold! the laws governing Sunday come into play, and the day of recreation is transformed into a day of Puritan gloom, so far as the officials can be induced to enforce the preachers' law. How completely this performance turns the light of exposure upon the wicked falsehoods and plottings of the day worshippers! If the Fourth of July, for instance, comes on Saturday, they never think of the abused laborer on the railroad who is being deprived of his "rest," but if it falls on Sunday they are in an agony of mingled grief and rage because the "soulless capitalist" is "reducing him to Sabbathless slavery," depriving him of the opportunity to "seek God's sanctuary." He who is deceived by the pretenses of the Sabbatarian is not wise.

If the preservations of regular periods of rest be the desire of the advocates of Sunday laws, why do they not enter their protest against night work? Any observing person will readily admit that day work is much less exhausting than the same amount of labor performed at night. If we must have law to compel men to rest one day in seven, it would seem that it is still more necessary that they be forced to sleep at night and do their work in the daytime. People also injure themselves by improper eating, but we have not yet had the pleasure of reading the report of the proceedings of a convention of theocrats held for the purpose of demanding sumptuary laws regulating the eating habits of the people of the United States, although similar legislation was once common in other lands. The palpable fact is, the ministers are engaged in the Sunday law crusade for the benefit of the church; that is, for their own emolument, not to lighten the burden of labor.

Secretary George Longford of Friendship Liberal League writes very enthusiastically of Mrs. Krekel's lecture in Philadelphia. This was to have been expected, for she is sure to please the cultured audiences that everywhere greet her. We hear good reports from all places where she has spoken on her Eastern trip. Mrs. Krekel should be kept constantly in the field. By the way, we notice that some of our friends refer to her as a resident of Kansas. This is a mistake; her home is in Kansas City, Missouri.

Robert E. Pattison is not mayor of Philadelphia. He was buried under more than sixty thousand adverse majority. This is good in itself, entirely regardless of the character of his successful opponent or the nature of the forces behind him. Men whose deliberate purpose it is to put their fellow citizens under a religious despotism should never be granted political power in a free republic.

James A. Hearn, of "Margaret Fleming" fame, and who has made such a phenomenal success of "Shore Acres," is now dramatizing Helen H. Gardener's "An Unofficial Patriot." He thinks that it is one of the finest pieces for the drama that has been written in a long time. It will be put on the boards with the best of accessories, Congressman Miner of this city being the financial factor in the enterprise.

That the Sabbath movement is very strong in some parts of Pennsylvania—saying nothing of other states—is well known. The Christian Reformer, speaking of the convention held in Altoona on Feb. 14 and 15, says that the pastors united in the call with the "greatest heartiness and unanimity," and "a large number of leading citizens, merchants, lawyers" et al., also attached their names. That is to say, in a city of more than thirty thousand inhabitants the clergy are a unit for repressive Sunday legislation, and so great is their influence that prominent business and professional men find it to their advantage to actively identify themselves with the crusade. Do the Liberals realize the magnitude of the task that is to be accomplished by the friends of equal freedom?

A writer in a Philadelphia paper defines worship as "love, plus obedience—to a superior." Then he adds:

"Now, to everyone of us, God is both our heavenly Father, and the presider over the human co-operative society. To him, each one owes love and obedience. Not to pay what we owe is immoral. Thus, no worship, no religion, is fundamental immorality!"

He has instanced the obedience that the dog renders to his master. But often the dog obeys because he fears, not because he loves; it depends on the nature of the master. If the dog "worships" because he fears, it would appear that said "worship" is fear, plus obedience, rather than love, plus obedience. That is the kind of worship that most men render to their god. They do not see anything for which to love him, but they have been told that he has a very hot hell into which he will lock them for eternity if they do not do so and so, and the result is that the churches have a pretty large membership. In these latter days, however, many of the churches are filled from other motives than either love or fear of the gods. How does this writer know that God is our heavenly father? Would a decent earthly father have drowned his children as this "presider over the human co-operative society" drowned the passengers of the Elbe? Anyway, human justice would have promptly hanged the man who committed such a crime, and there is no logical reason why the actions of an infinite criminal should be judged more leniently. We are told that no worship, no religion, is fundamental immorality, because not to pay what we owe is immoral, and we owe God love and obedience. The conclusion is bosh, because the major premise is unproven and unprovable. First prove that there is a God, and then let him do that which calls out our love, and we shall love him spontaneously, as we love whoever else is pleasing to us to such a degree as to awaken our affection. As to obedience, that is another matter; we herein America do not believe in autocracy nor in hereditary government. We must live in harmony with what, for want of a more explicit name, we call natural law, if we would not suffer, but we have no freedom of will in the premises, and we are under no obligation to say that we love Nature. Neither can we escape the consequences of our infractions of Nature's rules by saying that we believe what we cannot believe, and asking Nature's pardon.

VICTORY!

We Win the Opening Battle in Colorado.

HOUSE PASSES the CHURCH TAXATION BILL BY THE VOTE OF 34 to 26.

Strong Lobby Against it and Property Under $2,500 is Exempted, and, as the Basis of Assessment is One third, this means that all Churches Worth Less than $7,500 will still Sponge on the State. Yet it is a Good Beginning. Now for the Senate.

This excerpt from a letter received by THE TRUTH SEEKER from Hon. Joseph Gallagher, member from Clear Creek county in the Colorado House of Representatives, tells the friends of equal taxation some very good news:

I forward $5 to apply to subscription. Let the paper still go to the old address, as it falls into good hands for missionary work. I forwarded a copy of the Rocky Mountain News, with the vote on House Bill 106 taxing church property in Colorado. We did our duty; let us see what the Senate will do. There is a very strong lobby against the bill. Threats of political graves caused a few to waver on final passage, but not enough to defeat the measure.

The discussion preceding the passage of the bill was very animated and some of the "arguments" of the exemptionists were simply astonishing. It was evident that there were representatives who had not the most rudimentary conception of sociological principles, and whose ideas of justice would have been in harmony with sixteenth century environments. Mr. Whittier said that the proposed tax would be an impost upon benevolence, upon educational institutions, upon religion, and upon patriotism. Of course by educational institutions he meant denominational schools, established for the purpose of teaching theological dogmas at public expense. He apparently did not deem it necessary to explain what kind of benefactors they are who want to be generous out of other people's pockets, nor the nature of the religion and patriotism that make pious people sponge on those who take other ways to express their religious emotions and their love of country than the building of churches and the employment of missionaries.

Mr. Whittier also said that the bill "betrayed a sentiment like that which animated the French Revolution." This was an unfortunate allusion for the gentlemen, for it called sharply to mind the fact that the French Revolution was caused by the wholesale robbery of the French people by the clergy and the nobility, who had between them, with the aid of the crown, managed to appropriate four-fifths of the earnings of the people, and this in the names of "religion" and "patriotism." The men in the Colorado Legislature and outside of it who are trying to secure the equal taxation of church property are those who have read aright the terrible lesson taught by France and other countries which have been forced to learn equity through the stern logic of events, because they had failed to learn it through the logic of justice.

It is quite probable that the bill would not have passed had it not been for the concession of the $2,500 exemption clause made to the poorer churches. But there is no reason why churches worth less than $7,500 should not be taxed to one third of their valuation, as other property is taxed. The precedent is a dangerous one, for it will tempt the religious people to build more and cheaper churches and thus eventually get the major part of their wealth again into the dead head list. However, the triumph in the Colorado House of Representatives is a notable one, and we rejoice greatly thereat, for it seems to promise the coming of the day of equal rights for all citizens of the republic. If the Senate of the Centennial State does its duty as well as or better than the House has discharged its obligation and Governor McIntyre affixes his signature to the taxation bill the people of Colorado will have good reason to congratulate themselves that all is not lost.

Of the forty-one Republicans in the House twenty-one voted for the bill and sixteen against. Of the twenty-four Populists thirteen voted for it and ten against. Mrs. Cressingham and Mrs. Klock voted aye, and Mrs. Holly, who has been very bitterly assailed for her supposed friendship for the measure, voted nay.

We have put the best of pro-taxation arguments into the hands of the Senators, and now turn our attention to other states which have not yet been reached. We hope that our readers will render us all the assistance they can; this is their cause not less than ours.

Truth About the Tariff.

Mr. George Macdonald says: "Somebody ought to tell the truth about the tariff." I accept his kind invitation and will try to tell as much of the truth as can be packed into a short article.

As a soldier in the war for the emancipation of mankind I deem it my duty to wage relentless warfare upon delusion and superstition. As a Freethinker I fight that ancient and venerable superstition known as the Christian religion—the most evil and wicked thing, the greatest bar to human progress that now exists with the consent of civilized men. As a Freetrader I war upon that ancient and venerable delusion known as protectionism—an evil scarcely less gigantic than the Christian religion.

The two have much in common. Both are invasions of human freedom, obtruding force into the domain of liberty. Both shift the burden of proof, assuming the truth of dogmas simply because they have dominated the human mind from a time so ancient that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary and imposing upon their antagonists the impossible task of proving a negative. Both are beliefs out of which men reason themselves often, but into which men reason themselves never. Both illustrate the prodigious power among men of habit, custom, credulity, prejudice, tradition—the "iron hold of the past upon the present." Both are propagated by the same fallacies and owe their power to the same incurable ignorance of the "swinish multitude."

It is fitting, therefore, that THE TRUTH SEEKER should wish the truth about the tariff to be published far and wide. I cannot conceive that a truth seeker who does not wish to know the truth about the tariff is a genuine seeker after truth.

This is true about the tariff—that protection is robbery. A high tariff is high-handed spoliation, and a low tariff is spoliation on a smaller scale.

This is true about the tariff—that a tariff for revenue is only less odious and iniquitous than a tariff for protection. Both alike impose their burdens in proportion to what those who bear them consume of the necessities of life. The former taxes us on that basis. The latter robs us on the same unjust basis. Thus, whether the money wrung from the people goes into the public treasury, as under a revenue tariff, or into the pockets of the protected classes, as under a protective tariff, the enormous weight of the burden falls upon the poor, and the rich practically escape. And the wider the gulf between the rich and the poor, the greater the accumulations of wealth heaped up in the hands of a few, the grosser becomes the injustice. It is impossible under any tariff to compel the owner of 100 millions to pay 100 times as much as the owner of one million. But when we compare the amount contributed by the owner of 100 millions with that wrung from the owner of 100 or 1,000 dollars, the injustice is enormously greater. This should be kept in mind by those who quote the fathers of the republic in favor of protection. The injustice wrought by tariff taxation 100 years ago in this country was trifling in comparison with what is now done.

This is true about the tariff—that protection is slavery. The essence of slavery is in the fact that certain classes are armed with the power of the law to increase their wealth by seizing and appropriating to their own use part of the earnings of other classes. And that is done under a protective tariff just as effectually as under any other form of slavery. It is done, too, for that matter, under a revenue tariff. For the difference between seizing the money of the poor and handing it over to the rich, and compelling the poor to pay the taxes of the rich, is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee.

This is true about the tariff—that just as no man can seriously study Christian evidences and the "Holy Bible" and remain a Christian, so no man can seriously study the argument for protection without becoming a Freetrader. The argument annihilates itself. There is not a proposition laid down by orthodox protectionists that is not contradicted point blank by some other proposition laid down by orthodox protectionists.

As a Freethinker my religion is loyalty to Truth. Not "the truth as it is in Jesus," but the simple, naked truth. But there is in our religion, if we care to use the phrase, a holier trinity than the "Holy Trinity"—Truth, Justice, Liberty. These three are one. A worshiper of Truth must, therefore, be a worshiper of Liberty, and free trade is Liberty. He must also bow his head in the awful presence of Justice, and free trade is Justice. Protection must pass away. Delusion and superstition and the worship of mud gods must pass away.

Missions and Mission Funds.—Rings and Ring Masters.

Is it reasonable to believe that the immense sums of money raised by voluntary contributions in the four quarters of the globe, and delivered to self-constituted bodies of men for distribution at their own pleasure, and who reside thousands of miles from the contributors, will be handled with honesty and fidelity, knowing as we do that officers, public and private, under the eye of employers and bound under obligations with securities are so frequently caught in embezzling, stealing, swindling? Time and again has the public found out that almost every institution in which money is handled is honeycombed with fraud. Since the days when Price and Swartwout of old time song ran off with the public funds, what a long story of scoundrelism on a grand scale in the maladministration of public, bank and other corporation funds has been played out. Their number alone with the names of the head robbers will occupy quite a volume. Credit Mobilier, Tweed Ring, Star Routes, Navy Contract Frauds are suggestive reminiscences of a wondrous series ending down to the last few days in Carnegie Frauds, Lexow Investigation, Comstock Bribe. Week after week does one exposure follow another, just as day after day one murder after another is related by the newspapers, and yet the ill doers are held to do right by all the dangers of immediate exposure, of condign punishment and disgrace.

How then can it be possible that there never has been a Missionary Ring discovered in the manipulation of the millions of dollars annually intrusted to irresponsible hands during the past hundred years? The idea was suggested to the writer upon the perusal of a work entitled "Seeley's Wonders of Ellora," published about 1820. Seeley was a subaltern of a British regiment of India, and was a pious, ordinary person who, having visited the famous Rock Cut Temples of India, desired to give an account of his journey and observations. In order to make a book complete Seeley describes various things he had observed during his long residence in that country. Among other affairs he devotes some attention to the missionary cause, and does it in the most respectful manner, and speaks of some things with evident reluctance. In reading lately the severe comments on the missionaries of India by a Hindoo in the Boston Arena, we were struck by the agreement between his statements of what is done to-day and those made nearly eighty years ago by the forgotten but honest soldier, Seeley, in his deeply interesting book. Both ask a question like this: Suppose the Buddhists of India were to send a company of missionaries to a Christian nation, our own, for example, and keep up a continual supply of funds amounting to millions of dollars per year? How many converts would they make; from what classes of people would the converts be drawn, and how would the enormous funds come in time to be administered?

It has always seemed wonderful to me that Seeley's work has never been republished. It would attract attention to these wondrous rock cut temples which far surpass the Pyramids of Egypt, over which so much time is expended and concerning which so many books are published.

What Seeley says of them is no doubt true. Indeed, according to him, language is inadequate to describe them fully. One of these temples alone must have cost more time and labor than any one of the Pyramids, for the mere excavation, let alone the magnificent and perfect carving and statuary by which every square-foot of walls, ceilings, colonades, pillars, doors, and stairways are adorned. The description in "Asiatic Researches," by the learned society of which Sir Wm. Jones and Warren Hastings were presidents, confirms the truth of Seeley's assertions. Evidently the missionaries would disfavor any attempt to call for a too critical investigation of them, as some questions on their antiquity might discredit Bible chronology. At first but very few men could have space in which to work. As only after a long time more workers could have room a question naturally arises: These temples are made diagonally through the mountain of solid granite rock; a large entrance is made, then an area of several feet is carved out leaving a vast quadrangular mass for the temple, of varying size according to size of temple, say 40 to 60x100 feet, and two stories high. Then the work of excavating the rooms, stairways, galleries, doors, etc., was done. Pillars, statues, and the like, were carved out at certain distances, with altars. The ornamentation is incredibly perfect and beautiful, every square foot being elaborately carved with minute exactness. When Seeley wrote he says we, of that time, had no implements hard and durable enough to work upon the material. One of the largest temples has a miniature temple in its center about 15x20, all duly finished—a perfect monolith.

There is one thing concerning one of these temples that has never been observed so far as I know, and that is, at one end is a set of steps leading from the outside down to a carved basin destined to hold water. From an opening in the top of the mountain water has fallen on some of the steps during the rainy season for ages, so long, in fact, that the falling water has worn away a large number of the steps so that to reach the bottom a ladder of several feet has to be used to get down. As the other temples have steps from the same side leading down to similar reservoirs there can be no question but the steps thus worn away by water originally led down to the very top of the carved basin, and indeed the ruins prove it. How many ages were these temples in building? How many ages did it take the water, falling a few months each year from one hundred feet above, to wear twelve feet of hard granite steps? And yet so absurd have been the accounts given by missionaries in order to preserve their Moses and his chronology that they have even alleged that all these stupendous, almost miraculous, works were done during the life of one man.

Seeley publishes extracts from some British periodicals to show how vain and futile had been the efforts to convert the Hindoos—extracts from works friendly to the missions but censuring the great abuses that had already grown up. One returned missionary is represented as having spoken to a large congregation and described the grand work done, and the hardships, privations, and persecutions endured by the poor missionaries. A gentleman from India who was present, after the meeting accosted the orator, saying, "Are you not the Rev. —?" "Yes." "You reside at —, —, in a splendid house, surrounded with luxuries, and waited on by a large number of servants —" "Hush—be quiet. How do you know this?" "I lived for years near by and know all about it. How can you tell such things?" "O, my dear friend, it is necessary to arouse the sympathies, else we could not live there as missionaries," etc., etc.

He then shows by reports of the foreign missionary societies of England the millions of dollars annually wasted in such enterprises. One society alone gave over two hundred thousand pounds yearly. He says the object is good, regrets to have to make the exposures he does make. Plainly he is an honest and friendly critic. Take the missionaries' own statements, and all this vast outlay is a fraud.

Read what say the Jesuits Huc and Gabet on the "Chinese Empire and Travels in Tartary," the two most interesting works of travels ever published, every page rich with wonderful information, glowing with humor and life. China once had millions of converts, hundreds of Christian temples, yet nearly all have disappeared. These superstitious, illogical, but brilliant Jesuit Fathers could time and again rejoice and thank providence for supplying them with argols (dried dung) in their journeys through the endless steppes of Mongolia, to further their cause, but never seem to wonder why the same providence fails to extend his hand to protect the persecuted converts! The Eighth Financial Conspiracy Brewing.

The suggestions made in Comptroller Eckel's article on finance in the North American Review, and further set forth in his report to Congress, explained at length by Secretary Carlisle and approved by President Cleveland in his message to Congress, took shape in a bill which was submitted to the House Committee on Banking, reported favorably by the committee, and defeated in the House.

The bill was a menace to the welfare of the American people and their government. This is the sort of pernicious class legislation which has been blighting the prosperity of our people and sapping the vitality of our government in defiance of the principles upon which the republic is founded, and which will surely lead to its ultimate destruction.

Instead of giving more power to the bankers, the power they already have should be taken from them and vested in the government where it rightly belongs. Is this indeed a "government of the people" by the bankers and for the bankers? What the government and the people of the United States, which every American citizen should remember are one—if this is really a "government of the people, by the people, for the people," the people are the government and the government is the people—what they have to expect from the bankers has been plainly shown by history.

Since the dark days when our country was plunged in the night of civil war, and the bankers took advantage of its distress and traded upon the government's need by demanding the ruinous interest of from 24 to 36 per cent for the money necessary to carry on its defense, the bankers have brought the American people from affluence to biting poverty by successive acts of legislation which they have caused to be passed in their own interest.

These acts of legislation enacted in the sole interest of the bankers and to the great injury of the people, have been aptly called the "Seven Financial Conspiracies," and cleverly explained in a little pamphlet of that name by Mrs. S. E. V. Emery, of which I give a brief abstract as follows:

The first of these conspiracies caused the depreciation of the people's money, the best money ever issued, the greenback, by placing upon it the infamous exception clause. Congress had made the money of the government full legal tender for all debts, but at the instance of the bankers the Senate amended the bill by adding "except duties on imports and interest on the public debt," which from that time forward should be paid in coin.

This was equivalent to saying that the greenback was good enough for the government to pay to the people, good enough for the government to pay to the soldiers who poured out their life blood in its defense, but not good enough for the people to pay to the government, nor yet good enough for the government to pay to the bankers.

The second conspiracy resulted in the National Bank Act, passed in 1863. This act permitted the banker to purchase with his depreciated greenback, which he could now get from the people at the rate of $285 in greenbacks for $100 in gold, government bonds to the full face value of the greenbacks on which he could draw interest in gold in advance, and have at the same time 90 per cent. of his investment returned to him in National Bank notes. That is, for his original $100 in gold he got $285 in bonds and interest.

The third scheme was that of contracting the currency by destroying the greenbacks. In pursuance of this plan the Act of April 12th, 1866, was passed, whereby it was provided that a regular and systematic cremation of greenbacks should take place. Under this Act the people's money has from year to year been called in, millions at a time, and destroyed, in consequence of which we have from year to year less money, more tramps, more strikes, more business failures, and ever increasing poverty of the people.

The fourth conspiracy brought about the Credit Strengthening Act, which gave the bankers power to demand of the government face value redemption in gold of the bonds purchased by the depreciated greenbacks. That is, the banker having paid one hundred dollars in gold for $285 in greenbacks, and having paid the government the greenbacks for their face value in bonds, and having received his interest in gold and had ninety per cent of his investment returned to him, now demanded that the government return to him $285 in gold for the paper-bought bonds. What the banker virtually demanded was $285 in gold for $100, besides the interest. When this bill was passed there were 189 bankers and many bondholders in the two houses of Congress.

The act approved July 14, 1870, providing for the refunding of the national debt was the result of the fifth conspiracy. The scheme is one which, while preventing the government from paying the national debt as the money accumulates for that purpose, obliges the people to pay interest upon the accumulated money while it lies idle in the treasury, or, more provoking still, is deposited with national banks, which have been granted its free use.

"Having refunded, and made payable in coin, bonds which had not cost their holders more than sixty cents on the dollar," to prevent the payment of the bonds and to increase their value, the demonetization of silver was accomplished by an act passed in 1873. This sixth financial conspiracy depreciated the money value of silver and thus produced further contraction of the currency.

The seventh conspiracy resulted in the act passed Jan. 24, 1875, authorizing the secretary of the treasury to destroy the fractional currency and issue silver coin in like denominations to take its place. Untaxed interest-bearing bonds were issued, of such large denominations that only capitalists were able to carry them with which to purchase silver bullion for the authorized coinage. The interest on the bonds was another burden added to the people's load of debt, while by the destruction of the greenbacks and fractional currency the money upon which the people paid no interest was taken away from them.

It is easily seen that each one of these acts of Congress was of great benefit to the bankers and wrought untold injury to the people and their government. But while the people of the United States are struggling under a load too heavy for them to bear, the bankers are still the favorite children of the government, and it is proposed to give them still further privileges to wring from the people the last dollar and the last bit of land until they are reduced to a condition of hopeless impoverishment and servitude.

The proposed eighth financial conspiracy, as set forth by Comptroller Eckels, Secretary Carlisle, and President Cleveland contemplated, first, the repeal of all laws requiring or authorizing the deposit of United States bonds as security for circulation. Second, handing over by the government to the national banks the entire issuance of currency and, Third, the exemption of state banks from taxation. President Cleveland said in his message to Congress: "The absolute divorcement of the government from the business of banking is the ideal relationship of the government to the circulation of the currency of the country." No doubt it is the "ideal relationship" from the banker's point of view. The proposition to repeal all laws providing for the deposit of United States bonds as security for circulation was also ideal for the bankers, and the exemption from taxation would be even more ideal, and the advantage gained is so practical. Comptroller Eckels naïvely admits that "the profit upon the issue of circulation to the banks would be so augmented that it would be giving to them a franchise for which it is suggested they should be called upon to make some return to the general government."

Comptroller Eckels goes on to state "that the general government ought to be wholly free from the direct issuing and redeeming of notes to pass as money among the people. No government has ever yet successfully engaged in so doing, and the experience of the government of the United States is no exception to the rule"—to which he should have added, owing to the intolerable interference of the bankers. These are strange statements to make to a people who are finding out day by day that the franchises sold by government or municipality to private corporations are invariably managed to enrich those private corporations and to grind the people and demoralize the government. Why not suggest that the Postoffice, the best organized department in the United States, be handed over to the express companies, and they be authorized to increase or diminish the postage at will? No one would be foolish enough to imagine that any one would be the gainer by the plan but the express companies.

These eminent financiers dwell a good deal upon the "elasticity" to be obtained by leaving the issue of currency to the banks. This elasticity, deemed so desirable, is the power to contract and expand at will—to squeeze the people by contracting the volume of money all that they can bear and expanding only when they can endure no more. There will be a great deal more of "contraction" than "expansion" certainly, and the government and the people can expect just so much mercy as the martyrs received from the inquisitors in the dark ages. The inquisitors were wont to pause at the limit of human endurance long enough to let the victim gather strength to bear more torture. The tender regard that is exhibited by these high officials for the welfare of the bankers would be very much more seemly if shown for the people and their government. Why this consideration for the banker? Have the pangs of hunger been gnawing at his vitals? Have tattered garments exposed him to the inclement weather? Is he compelled to seek shelter at night under an artistic arrangement of shingles, canvas and scraps of old carpet on the salubrious dumps? Their condition must be deplorable indeed, for Congress to come to their relief while a million honest workmen seek in vain for employment to keep themselves and families from starvation.

We must all, however, heartily concur with the concluding paragraph of Comptroller Eckels's paper in the North American Review. If he is wrong in every other statement, he is certainly right when he says: "But until the whole currency and banking system of the country is formulated in one harmonious plan, in which each part shall be absolutely sound in principle and the embodiment of monetary science, there can be no hope of undisturbed and substantial prosperity for the American people." This is undoubtedly true, but that harmonious plan must be controlled and managed by the government whose officers are elected by and answerable to the people of the United States. L. L.

Scientific thought is the guide of action. The truth which it arrives at is not that which we can ideally contemplate without error, but that which we may act upon without fear. Scientific thought is not an accompaniment, a condition of human progress, but human progress itself.—Clifford.

News and Notes.

There was a "southerly wind and a cloudy sky" when I left Link's Creek and Lonesome Valley on Monday morning, Feb. 11th. Lonesome Valley is rightly named, for it stretches away for miles without a habitation, surrounded by bare and desolate hills, in whose bosom is supposed to be uncounted wealth of gold. This was once a volcanic country, and the evidences of primeval fires are still to be discovered. The yawning craters confront one as one winds along the heights. Lonesome Valley, however, could be made a perfect garden if water was only stored up for summer's use. There are rains enough at certain seasons of the year, but from June to September there is scarcely a drop. No doubt the science of man will some day fill this land with the glory of harvest.

The storm held off, I guess, for our especial benefit, and only a slight mist pervaded the evening air. I gave my last lecture at Prescott and in Arizona on "Christianity and Woman," which I found to be a very interesting and ghastly subject. The treatment of woman by Christianity is one of the most terrific pages of human history. It makes the blood boil to think of the indignities that have been poured upon the "daughters of Eve" simply because woman was the first to begin the upward path of learning and progress; while Adam was a sneak and a coward. Ever since the theologian has tried to wreak his vengeance on woman, denying her an immortal soul, declaring her to be the child of the devil and the way of hell. Kings and priests have united to outrage, disgrace, dishonor and deny her every right and privilege. Her personality has been absolutely annihilated by the holy authority of the Christian religion, and I do not understand how woman can any longer bend her neck to the yoke.

I had a good audience, and after a campaign where so much has been accomplished, it was a pleasure to gather our ranks once more, shake hands all round, and look forward to the broadening future. The work in Arizona shows what can be done in hundreds of places in this land if there is only the energy and determination to go ahead. The elements are present for success with leadership and combination. The forces of Freethought are vast indeed, but the power of concentration is lacking. I have no doubt the winter's work in Arizona will have its summer's harvest. We shall keep the army in motion.

I leave Prescott for Santa Fe, N. Mex., on Tuesday morning, Feb. 12th, and after a twenty-four hours' ride or more arrive at my destination. The snow begins to come down and the storm increases as it sweeps westward from the plains of Kansas, where I understand it has been howling for two or three days. Trains from the East are delayed several hours; but fortunately our train is on time; and I am at hand to meet my engagement in Santa Fe. But the snow is a foot deep, and it keeps accumulating until evening, and the weather is so extraordinary that people scarcely venture out. In fact, quite a number got the impression that I was unable to make connection, and was left somewhere on the road, and the janitor did not put in an appearance, and at the hour of the lecture the Court-house had no light or fire for the few who had gathered. However, we succeeded in opening the door and foraged for firewood in the depths of the cellar, and by 9 o'clock the stove was smoking and blazing, and I gave my lecture. The two following nights the court-house was lighted and warmed as well as could be expected under the circumstances, for the cold continued. The thermometer was sixteen degrees below zero, and the inhabitants, being unused to this piercing atmosphere, stayed at home. My audiences were small but appreciative. I feel sure that under more favorable circumstances I could have a large attendance, though Freethought is something entirely new in this community. Santa Fe is an old city. It claims to have been settled three years before St. Augustine. It has a large Mexican population, about 9,500, while there are but 500 Americans. Hence there is a small minority out of which to make a Freethought audience. Mexicans are under the power of the church, which here has some of its most splendid edifices and imposing officials, and its authority is great. The old church building is said to have been constructed in 1580.

Years ago Santa Fe was an important military post and trading station. The railroad left it somewhat out in the cold, it being about twenty miles from the main line. It has increased but little in population during the last twenty years, and only within the last three years has it begun to put on a modern appearance. There is a great mining country about it. The hills are full of gold and silver still undiscovered. The agricultural resources are extensive, so that it needs only the new and better times that are coming to make Santa Fe a booming metropolis, for it is evidently on the great line of travel from Galveston to the North. Of course those who have an eye to the future know that one of these days a railroad will run from Patagonia through South America and Panama via Galveston and Santa Fe, opening up a mighty, vast country through this central section, and from Santa Fe the railroad will go north through British Columbia and Alaska, across the Bering Straits to Siberia, and thence to Paris and London. This appears like a dream to the prosaic mind—that one can thus start from Cape Horn in a palace car and stop not until he arrives at Westminster Abbey. But the scientific imagination takes it all in; and the mountain regions about Santa Fe will then burst into uncounted wealth; for a vast wilderness will be the garden of the world, amidst the quaintness and ancientness of Santa Fe, its curious mingling of the old and the new, its far away roots in the past, its golden outlook, its infusion of American life with its rustle and its bustle, one can have glowing visions of the to-morrow when steam and electricity shall sound the reveille of advance. I suppose Santa Fe is beautiful in summer, and it was beautiful also amidst these wintry landscapes. The snow-crowned hills sweeping away into the dazzling distance, the fields and plains between with white effulgence, the city wrapt in frosty splendor, made indeed a magnificent picture. The venerable town wore an unwonted aspect of liveliness and variety, and I did not regret that I arrived when it was gleaming in such novel fashion. I found staunch friends in Santa Fe, not a great many of them, but as good as gold. Mrs. C. A. Berleth was the originator of the forward movement, and she labored faithfully against great odds. She is alive with the spirit of Freethought, and has the courage of a pioneer. She combined our forces and did the best that could be done under the circumstances. We have gained a foothold, and greater things will be accomplished hereafter. We must thank Mrs. Berleth for giving us a good start. Mr. G. C. Berleth, although suffering from ill health, did not miss a night at the lectures; Mr. Lewis Schormeyer was also a sturdy supporter and didn't fail to lend a hand. Mr. and Mrs. John C. Hull, Charles Hull, Mrs. Pauline Hass, Mr. and Mrs. S. Haffner, George Blakely, Ernest Knaelel, J. S. Canonde-laie, F. Muller, J. H. Blain, John V. Conway are also among those who stood by the colors, even if the winter winds did blow.

Mr. J. G. Schumann is one of the old residents of Santa Fe, having located here about thirty years ago. He is one of the foremost citizens of the place in wealth and standing, and he has never been ashamed to speak his honest thought. He has been a Freethinker all his life; one of those staunch reformers from the Fatherland, of whom Carl Heinzen was such a noble example.

I was especially pleased to make the personal acquaintance of E. E. Mensch, who helped to keep the banner of Freethought afloat on the coast, and who, with the same ardor, distributes Liberal literature where it will do the most good. The Secular Pilgrim will always remember his generous aid on this frontier line.

It was my good fortune to stop at the Claire, of which E. T. Webber is the proprietor. Mr. Webber was formerly of Denver, where he was in the ranks of the reformers. He has no use for superstition or tyranny of any kind. He is posted on the great subjects of the day, and is interested in all human advancement. He believes in the reign of the people, and industrial and intellectual emancipation. His hotel is one of the most elegant and comfortable in the Western country, and no Freethinker should fail to go there when he strikes the capital of New Mexico.

The old capitol building is burnt down, but a new and magnificent structure will take its place. The legislature is in session, but nothing of any importance is transpiring. A majority of the members, I understand, are Mexicans. An interpreter is necessary in order to carry on the debates. I guess this is the only legislature in the country where two languages are spoken, and where all speeches and bills must be translated—the English into Mexican, and the Mexican into English. To the onlooker it is a rather novel procedure to have each sentence slowly interpreted as it is uttered. There is not much chance for flights of oratory when one has to stop at the end of a period for a translation.

With Mrs. Berleth I visited the Historic Room and the Old Curiosity Shop of Jake Gold, where the relics of hundreds of years are gathered together; and it is a sight to see indeed; the ancient saddles and carts and trunks, and "old clothes" and pictures, and cooking utensils from the cliff dwellers onwards to the present day. A vast variety confronts the view; and we behold the evolution of man. Especially was I interested in the display of gods. There are any number of them, and they are solid ones too, made of stone, and they look as if they would last forever. They have the appearance of all gods, and don't look as if they knew much. They lack expression. But while the gods of Greece and Rome and Judea disappear, these gods have come to stay; hundreds of them, in solemn ranks, just as good as they ever were and just as capable of helping humanity. I like these gods because they mind their own business, and don't interfere in the affairs of this world. Sherman said that the only good Indian is a "dead Indian." We might say the same of a god. The only good one is a stone-dead one.

I took a survey of the elegant filigree jewelry of S. Spitz, the manufacturer. Certainly the precious metals assume the most delicate and beautiful forms under the manipulation of skilled artists. They charm the masculine view while they must perfectly enchant the feminine vision with gauze-like wings and floating clouds, and glittering petals, and flashes of color, with radiance of silver and gold.

So with many memories of ancient barbaric times mingled with grand and lovely views of nature, and visions of glory and liberty in the days to come, when civilization shall be at its bloom in this great belt of the world's commerce, I leave Santa Fe Feb. 16th and arrive at Trinidad, the holy city of the Trinity, on the same day at about 6 P. M. I have a warm welcome here, and find hundreds of Liberals. I open on Sunday afternoon. Last night, Monday, at the third lecture, I had about five hundred present. I have not found any place more favorable than this point for Liberal work. The best people of the place are interested in the lectures. Next week I shall write more fully of the outlook, and describe this bright and lively country, where the seeds of Freethought are producing so fair a fruitage.

Mrs. Krekel's Visit to the East.

Last Friday evening the Manhattan Liberal Club heard the best lecture of this season. Notwithstanding the day was the anniversary of Washington's birth the German Masonic Hall was well filled, and Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel's lecture upon "The Criminal Classes; How Produced; the Responsibility and the Remedy," which was so eloquently and earnestly delivered, was listened to by an audience which was generous in its applause of the pointed and truthful criticisms of penal institutions and modes of dealing with crime and punishing criminals. Mrs. Krekel does not believe in remedies for our social vices that reach only the offenders, that do not remove the causes. For doing away with criminals and crimes the importance of pre-natal culture and healthy environment was emphasized. As a present mode of punishing offenders against the law, she cited a case in St. Louis, where the children of a mother who kept a disorderly house were taken away upon the pretext that she was not fit to manage children. What the authorities did was merely to place them behind prison bars where for some time they lacked a mother's care, were untidy and brought to a low state of health. Instead of punishing the mother the children were made the victims of the law. "Why did they not go further," the lecturer asked at the end of the recital, "and provide the children with the care and comfort they should have had?" Mrs. Krekel pointed out that instead of preventing crime by such methods it was promoted. Innocence is made familiar with the cells of guilt, self respect and high impulses for good are crushed. The lecture was a thorough and able one, and its excellence lies in its advocacy of basic remedies for existing social wrongs.

Sunday afternoon the Brooklyn Philosophical Association had the pleasure of listening to Mrs. Krekel upon "Old and New Theories." A fashionable audience greeted her and went away with the opinion that she is a most remarkable woman. The lecture was philosophical and comprehensive. Old theories were shown to be inimical to progress while the new theories of science and life are the lines upon which we must expect to advance. It is not saying too much that to hear this lady is an intellectual treat one gets but rarely.

In the evening Mrs. Krekel spoke before the Newark Liberal Club on "The Criminal Classes" and is now on her way to Cincinnati where, I believe, she will stay for a month. E. D.

It is arbitrarily laid down that we must submit to the rule of Christ, whether that rule be just or whether it be unjust, whether it be commendable or whether it be repugnant to our conscience. It amounts, indeed, to a constitutional question. Upon its foundation has been reared that frightful system of Christian persecution which started with Priscillianus, in the fourth century, for its first victim, and has traversed down through the ages, spreading suffering and devastation on every side. The constitution sought to be reared upon the basis of this arid intolerance regards the human mind and body in the light of mental and physical slaves; it views man as a creature manufactured by his creator for the main purpose of flattering his maker—a creature intrusted with a little span of life, and endowed with a little flicker of understanding for the increasing purpose of pandering, more or less imperfectly, to the vain desires of his God while yet in this life, and, at the same time, of preparing himself with greater fitness to flatter more devoutly by and by. This notion seeks to annihilate the right of private judgment here, under a threat of penalty hereafter. I venture to think it high time this system of dastardly intimidation, this unspeakably dark side of Christianity, was finally quashed. This cowardly tenet has frightened millions of timid souls into what is aptly termed the "fear of the Lord," and made them cringe before the imaginary phantoms of the skies; make, them, in other words, hypocrites for the glory of God.—N. L. Prosser, in Agnostic Journal.

It was a bright remark made by another Boston man, the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," to the effect that the extent of a nation's possessions has generally been in inverse ratio to the length of their weapons of war. The shorter the sword the longer the nation's boundary lines. The same truth applies to battles for reform. The revolutions of the world are wrought by close encounters with specific evils. Wars are waged a battle at a time; and while a declaration of war upon unjust social conditions is all very well, it must be remembered that wars consist of battles, and that battles consist of struggles for specific points of vantage. Scott spent many hours besieging Chapultepec. Suppose some officer had said that Chapultepec was but a small part of Mexico and he was waging war against Mexico, and when Mexico fell the castle of Chapultepec would fall with it! He would have occupied a position very similar to that occupied by many reformers, who are too captivated with the idea of capturing Mexico to assist in the storming of Chapultepec. In all history this has been the weakness of idealists.—Voice.

It is the difficulty of reconciling the professions of Christianity with their practice which inspires the Moslem with such a boundless confidence in what he feels to be his own moral superiority. If his religion tells him to slay, he slays remorselessly, and he maintains that he does so with no more barbarity and with far more consistency than the Christians did who were commanded by General Kauffman to exterminate Tartar hordes in Central Asia, or by the Russian General Suwaroff, who within the memory of man put 38,860 men, women, and children to death at the siege of Ismail. In the eyes of the Mohammedan these butcheries were quite inexcusable, because they were not done on any religious principle, whereas he feels he is as much justified in slaughtering by divine command in Bulgaria as was the Joshua of old Canaan, whose acts of a similar nature both Christians and Mohammedans consider sacred.—Laurence Oliphant.

The myths of Paganism are as dead as Osiris or Zeus, and the man who should revive them, in opposition to the knowledge of our time, would be justly laughed to scorn; but the coeval imaginations current among the rude inhabitants of Palestine, recorded by writers whose very name and age are admitted by every scholar to be unknown, have, unfortunately, not yet shared their fate, but even at this day are regarded by nine-tenths of the civilized world as the authoritative standard of fact and the criterion of the justice of scientific conclusions in all that relates to the origin of things, and among them of species. In this nineteenth century, as at the dawn of modern physical science, the cosmogony of the semi-barbarous Hebrew is the incubus of the philosopher and the opprobrium of the orthodox.—Prof. T. H. Huxley, "Lay Sermons."

Freethought Progress.

A new Freethought paper called El Libre Examen has been started at Merida, Yucatan, Mexico. The editor is D. Thomas Paves Ponce.

The Vossischer Zeitung of Berlin reports that while new and costly churches are constantly going up in that city "the ministers preach to empty benches."

Grant Allen's very interesting article, "Easter Celebration and Resurrection," in Fortnightly Review, has been translated into Dutch and appears in De Dageraad for November, 1894.

Jules Des Essarts, president and founder of the Freethought society of Charleroi (see biography in "Four Hundred Years of Freethought"), has been elected member of the Belgian Senate.

Le Bluet is a French magazine of literature and art, edited by Mr. C. Oilwa, whose photograph can be found in "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." Mr. Oilwa is an Anglo-American Frenchman of great ability and push. He is president of several societies, administrative member of others, editor of La Vérité, Freethought organizer and lecturer, and what not. The French minister of art and education has awarded Le Bluet a bust for 1892 and two magnificent vases for 1893.

The second volume of Mr. F. J. Gould's "Concise History of Religion"; Charles O. Cattell's "Pebbles from the Ocean of Truth"; a new edition of Max Müller's "Chips from a German Workshop"; Voltaire's "Short Prose Tales"; the fifth edition of Charles Bray's "The Education of the Feelings: A System of Moral Training for the Guidance of Teachers, Parents, and Guardians of the Young"; a biography of John Addington Symonds; "Darwinism and Race Progress," by Professor Huxley; and a study of the philosophy of John Stuart Mill, by Charles Douglas, are among the works just issued from the English press or announced to appear soon which are of interest to Freethinkers. The Literary Guide, to which we are indebted for many of the book items which are found in this department, says that Mr. Gould's History is a work which "will be immensely helpful to students of the world's religions." The Humanitarian reports that during December "the cause of rational Sunday amusement" "made marked strides" in England. On "Museum Sunday" an experiment was made and the public were admitted to "the Dulwich Picture Gallery, Sir John Soane's museum, the Flaxman and Grafton Galleries, Apsley House, the New Gallery and the Brasseley Museum. They had, also, free access to the Kew Museum and Exhibition of Pictures and the Royal Botanical Gardens, to the Picture Galleries of Hampton Court Palace, and to the Painted Hall in Greenwich Hospital. An assembly was held at the Piccadilly Galleries in the evening. In every respect the experiment was most successful. Crowds of decorous and well conducted persons, of the working classes for the most part, availed themselves of these opportunities of indulging in a little rational amusement." Lord Esher, Master of the Rolls, very severely censured the Lord's Day Observance Society for its prosecution of three citizens of Leeds for their more or less remote connection with Sunday evening lectures. He put the costs of the appeal on the society and told it that if it was so horror-stricken at the thought of workingmen being kept out of the public houses on Sunday evenings by innocent entertainments its members "must be careful to take proceedings against the proper persons, and must be able to strictly prove their case." It was evident that the judge was glad that the society had failed to do so in this instance. H. Beerbohm Tree writes in the Humanitarian that during 1894 one hundred and ten performances were given on Sunday by bands in the various parks. In regard to bands the friends of the Free Sunday have "already triumphed" in London. The trustees and directors of the British Museum and National Gallery express the desire to open on Sunday afternoons. The victory over Sabbatarianism will be won in England before the close of the century unless the forces of reaction gather their energies for a last desperate conflict with the spirit of the age, and so achieve a temporary triumph.

The Chicago Times has recently spoken out clearly and unqualifiedly in favor of the taxation of church property. The Denison (Texas) Gazetteer of Jan. 6 has a very good article in condemnation of proscription for opinion's sake, and advocating the broadest liberty for all forms of religious belief and propaganda. It is timely and excellent. Mr. Murray truly and tersely says that religion must be kept out of politics if our institutions are to be preserved. We are pleased to see that Science has been revived. It is now under the editorship of Prof. D. O. Gilman of Johns Hopkins University, and is alive with the spirit of Freethought. The Unity (Chicago), the organ of the radical Unitarians and other progressive religionists of the West, has been enlarged. Hon. F. M. Hurst introduced in the Legislature of Georgia the preamble and resolution which will be found below. They were referred to the Committee on the State of the Republic. In introducing the resolution, Mr. Hurst said: "It is high time that we go on record in no uncertain terms on this question. I firmly believe that this resolution should be adopted, and for that reason I have introduced it. I shall do all in my power to secure its adoption by the House." This is the resolution:

WHEREAS in February, 1893, there was begun an organized movement by a religious combination composed of the evangelical churches of the country to get the government of the United States committed by direct legislation to a recognition of the Christian religion and a national adoption and enforcement of Sunday as the Christian Sabbath or Lord's day, and

WHEREAS They proposed first to accomplish their purpose by an amendment to the national Constitution declaring this to be a Christian nation, and so placing all Christian laws, institutions and usages upon an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land.

In 1888, May 21st, Senator H. W. Blair introduced a bill to secure to the people the enjoyment of the first day of the week, commonly known as the Lord's day, as a day of rest and to promote its observance as a day of rest and a day of religious worship, and on the 25th day of the same month he introduced a joint resolution to amend the national Constitution so as to establish the principles of the Christian religion as the religion of the nation.

These two pieces of legislation embodied the wishes of this religious combination, and immediately there was a strong effort made all over the country to secure the passage of the measures, especially the bill establishing and enforcing the observance of Sunday.

While it is true that this particular Sunday rest bill did not become a law, the legislation having died with the expiration of the Fiftieth Congress, it is also true that those who demanded, formulated and promoted this legislation, never slackened their efforts, and they have now, 1894, obtained the grand object of their ambition; they have the national government fully committed to the whole course of religious legislation.

In the Fifty-second Congress, first session, the Sunday law advocates concentrated all their forces and all their energies upon the point of securing the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday by an act of Congress.

They sent to Congress petitions, backed up by threats so overbearing that their threats were denounced on the floors of Congress as an abuse of the right of petition.

Yet so great was the pressure of these religious lobbyists that Congress succumbed and enacted into law the act closing the World's Fair on Sunday and making the appropriation conditioned on this provision, put on and demanded by these religious lobbyists, thus delivering the government, root and branch, over to these religious fanatics, to be governed and dictated to by them.

And in addition to this legislation, and in advance of it, the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a decision Feb. 29, 1892, in which the court unanimously declared this to be a religious people and a Christian nation, and so accomplished in the religious amendments to the Constitution proposed by Senator Blair.

Therefore, Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia, and it is hereby declared to be the sense of this body, that the above cited act of Congress is contrary to the principles upon which our government was established and contrary to the Constitution of the same, and that it is impolitic, unwise, undemocratic, and has a tendency to the union of church and state, and is therefore subversive of both our civil and religious liberties, and in our judgment is void and of no effect.

The committee having the resolution in charge reported it favorably, but as Mr. Hurst was absent because of sickness the resolution was not called up for passage and expired with the legislative session of 1894. The correspondent of the American Sentinel who sends that paper the information says that if the bill had been brought up it would assuredly have passed, and he adds that it will be introduced in the next session and will "be pushed to final action." Is it possible that the tide of theocracy is to encounter such a rock of obstruction? Let us hope that it will.

Lectures and Meetings.

FRANKLIN STEINER's lecture engagements so far as now arranged are:

Mar. 3.....Boston, Mass. Mar. 10.....Brooklyn, N. Y.
Mar. 3.....Brookton, Mass. Mar. 10.....Newark, N. J.
Mar. 8.....New York, N. Y.

Write Mr. Steiner for engagements in care of this office.

I must say that Mrs. Judge Krekel acquitted herself so ably that we kept her with us for two more lectures yesterday. And we are more than pleased with the result. The general verdict is that she is the ablest woman lecturer who ever spoke before our society. May her services be always in demand is our earnest desire. I am more than pleased to state that her course of four lectures with us was a grand success. The large hall was crowded on each occasion. I would advise all Liberal societies that have not heard her as yet to engage her, by all means. They will never regret it, I assure you. Such a talented speaker should be kept busy all the time.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Feb. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Within find $1 for Mr. Fleckten's Anti-Bible in the Public School Fund. I wish him success. I am myself just now fighting God-in-the-Constitution and By-Laws of the Young Men's Mutual Benevolent Association, this city, of which I have been a member for the past ten years. I have gained one point already; will let you know later how it winds up. My chances are slim, but I shall try.

QUINN, ONT., Feb. 2, E. M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $7 for renewal, Putnam's masterpiece, the ANNUAL and "All About the Holy Bible." Times are rather hard here, but I must have mental food if I starve the inner man to procure it. THE TRUTH SEEKER is all that the most ardent Freethinker could desire; it cannot fail to hasten the day when common sense will rule the world instead of superstition. I think I can get you a new subscriber or two pretty soon.

Yours fraternally, P. F. CLARK.

Unfortunately Environed.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 to help you in the Sunday repeal work. I could not get any signers to the repeal petition, so I send the dollar to help; would like to do more, but times will not permit. I am a canal boatman, and do not have any residence on shore, so I have no influence with members of the Senate or Assembly. The class that I come in contact with are mostly Catholics, and very bigoted at that. I distribute my TRUTH SEEKERS whenever I get a chance.

MR. EDITOR: I have been told that when the natives of Africa get into trouble they go to sleep, but when the natives of America or Europe get into trouble they go and get drunk on alcoholic spirit, and when they become so poor that they can't pay for their drinks any more, as is generally the case, they go to a revival meeting, and get drunk on imaginary spirit—what they call the spirit of the holy ghost—and when they get a big dose of that they become submissive tools for tyrants of all shades.

Yours truly, I. S. ODEGAARD.

Have Heard the Call to Work.

McMINNVILLE, OR., Feb. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: You will please send me one dollar's worth of Paine's "Age of Reason," "Common Sense," "The Crisis," "Cooper's Lectures." send all you can as they are for distribution.

We have had a grand celebration of Paine's anniversary, conducted by Mrs. A. E. Barker and Miss Nettie Olds. Mrs. B. is a splendid speaker; is waking us up to a sense of our duty. We had a good Sunday-school entertainment, lecture and fine dance. Our Sunday-school is increasing—have from forty to fifty pupils.

An Agreeable Change.

DEWATTO, WASH., Feb. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.75 for your valuable and highly moral paper and The Truth Seeker Collection of recitations, hymns, funeral discourses, etc., which I imagine will be a pleasant change from the eternal platitudes of the orthodox.

The financial conditions here are such that it is almost impossible with all the advantages which a new and undeveloped country is supposed to furnish for a man to make a living. Such publishers as yourself deserve from such as me more support than it is possible to give under such cursed financial legislation as we have had for the past thirty years. When a few irresponsible individuals can control the medium of a nation's exchange the workers and thinkers must be handicapped in their efforts.

Yours as a brother,

JOHN E. GREEN.

It Keeps Him Posted.

BLAINE, WASH., Feb. 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send you the money to pay my way for another year. I have been trying to get some one to send with me, but it seems a number would like to take the paper, but have not the money at present. I have not the money to spare, but I have to have the paper to know what is going on in the theological world. I got my "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" some time ago and am well pleased with the book. Please send me four ANNUALS and oblige. If you have any little tracts for free distribution send a few and I will put them where I think they will do the most good. Yours truly, A. GEERY.

Better Society than Church People.

CLOCKVILLE, N. N., Feb. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send you twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. I received a list of your publications. I do want a number of your books, but times are hard just now. I want (and must have) "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I had the money for it last fall, but my father-in-law's sudden death caused me to use the money for another purpose. I also want "Cosmian Hymn Book," and several others.

THE TRUTH SEEKER grows better and better. I should feel lonely indeed without it, as we have no society here except church people. I like Letters from Friends, also Children's Corner, as it proves Freethought is gaining ground.

Yours for truth, R. L. STISSER.

Complimentary, but Discriminatingly Critical.

ST. WENDEL, WIS., Feb. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 which please apply on my subscription. Also find inclosed a pledge which, of course, explains itself. I presume it is needless to say that I am a Freethinker. I believe that persons of my views are scarce in the teacher's profession. My position is, therefore, all the more exalted. I am what people might term a conservative Freethinker. Yet the articles in your valued paper strike me forcibly. Their logic is simply irresistible, and I find considerable satisfaction in their perusal. I have one objection to the appearance of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do not like the illustrations. I would sooner see them omitted, though they certainly are ludicrous in the extreme. Nevertheless, I wish you success, and remain as ever,

OTTO ZANDER.

Actions It Were Well to Imitate.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 11, E. M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: I send a few names to which I wish you would mail sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. You sent me a copy, but as I have taken the paper for over four years I gave the sample to a friend in hopes it may do some good. I have four volumes, two of which are bound. The binding I did myself.

I have plenty of amusement showing them to my friends who happen to call upon me which is "often," and with the usual result—argument.

Oh, there have been some hot times in my house. I am a member of the Friendship Liberal League, and am doing all I can to agitate the "Secular Sunday-school" question, for I consider it a great factor in mental emancipation.

I remain GEORGE M. FRINK.

The Support of the Liberal Press.

ATLANTA, GA., Feb. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: inclosed please find $3 for renewal of subscription. Though times are hard, they would be still harder were your paper to suspend its weekly visits. Every Liberal-minded person in the United States ought to make it a point of giving, within his means, his support to some exponent of Freethought to the end that his own thought may be expanded and strengthened. It is his duty also. Too much credit cannot be accorded those who have bravely pierced the phalanxes of the orthodox foe and made them feel something of the unconquerable energy, intellectual power and hatred of shams which inspire these lovers of the truth. Under the banner of Liberalism only shall we find that protection of the rights of conscience guaranteed in the fundamental law of the great republic. Let us then rally to the support of such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER, giving such aid as lies in the power of each to bestow. If we won't fight ourselves, let us pour in our contributions to the "commissary department," and give to those who will.

THOMAS M. TAYLOR.

Lecturer and Lectured Were Pleased.

LOUISVILLE, KY., Jan. 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. J. E. Remsburg lectured here on the 8th. He had a good audience; sold a great many copies of his publications; took some subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, and, upon the whole, gave entire satisfaction, and left well pleased. As you will see by the inclosed clipping we celebrated Thomas Paine's birthday last evening. The Courier Journal, also, gives us a fine notice. I shall try to get more readers for you. Last night I spoke of our excellent Freethought publications and expressed a wish that they would be more freely bought and read. The cause moves but slowly. We can only work on, and hope on. Everyone must do one's duty.

Truly, WM. T. CARTER, M. D.

The Publishers Fear the Preachers.

DANBURY, CONN., Jan. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The other day I bought Barnes' History of the United States, and I have read the history of the Revolutionary War, and I did not see the name of Thomas Paine mentioned in the whole account of it. I was surprised, having read his "Common Sense" and "The Crisis." And Mr. Paine was the first man to write "United States of America," and was our first Foreign Secretary under the Constitution and wrote the Declaration of Independence, and did more than any other man for his adopted country, for the pen is mightier than the sword. Can you inform me why his name is not mentioned? The History is not what it should be, for it has left out the most essential part of our history. I read years ago that Washington ordered "Common Sense" read to the army at every dress parade.

DOUGLAS FAIRCHILD

Want the Priest Neither in Life nor Death.

ADRIAN, MICH., Feb. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The pamphlet, "Federation and Union," was received and has been carefully read. It is most excellent reading in every respect; all the articles are able and right to the point. The article on Secular Sunday-schools, by Katie Kehm Smith, is very able and should be acted upon without delay by all Liberals throughout the whole country. The moulding of the young minds of our children should be taken out of the hands of priests and churches as soon as possible. The speech of S. P. Putnam is of course excellent, as usual, as all he writes or says is always first class. Judge Waite's article is clear and profound, in fact, the judge is a master in law and logic. But I will stop right here, as I have not the time to notice them all as their real merits deserve. You may send me $1 worth of them. I send you a slip from our paper, the Adrian Daily Times, on the death and funeral services of an old Freethinker, Cyrenus Whaley. I have known him for fifty years; he was the best customer I had for Liberal books, but he has gone the way we all must go sooner or later. Mr. Whaley was 78 years of age, and the funeral was purely secular. Yours truly, P. B. REASONER.

Another Example of Race Prejudice.

EL PASO, TEX., Feb. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please credit me with $5. My subscription is long past due, not owing to "hard times," but to the fact that I have been roaming and had no fixed abode in which to receive my mail. Have not seen a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER since May, 1894. I suppose it goes regularly to Mexico, and if so, it will surely find ample room for its "missionary" work. If any place or people need the influence of such journals more than "Old Mex," it certainly has my most sincere sympathy.

I would like to inquire through your columns whether or not Mexican Catholics are recognized by the pope of Rome? Although I am positive that they are, am unable, from lack of proof, to convince an antagonist (an Irish Catholic) that such is the case, and that by practicing such foolish mummery he is just as much a savage as they. Hoping to send you a book order soon, I am, Most respectfully yours,

C. W. EDWARDS.

[Of course the pope recognizes the Mexican Catholics, as he does all other Catholics, not schismatic. Although the Catholics in Mexico are very superstitious, the church there does not rule the government to the extent that our government is dominated by the Catholic and Protestant priesthoods.—Ed. T. S.]

Mortuary—Martin M. Hilliard.

OCKFORD, ILL., Feb. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Martin M. Hilliard, one of the earliest subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this city, breathed his last Feb. 9, '95. He was 76 years old. He was a lover of truth, an admirer of liberty, and an advocate of good order and decency. He was free from any creed or dogma. He was convinced that it was duty and present benefit that should incite good actions, and not imagined rewards in some other life; that law, public opinion, personal feeling and judgment are the sources of ethical action, and not the fear of future punishment; that evolution is the truth, and that nature's laws, like nature itself, have ever existed; that neither nature nor its laws are the production of any power or force, superior to, or distinct from, itself; that the universe is an eternity, and all its motions to everlasting activities are within its own everlasting supremacy; that life and brain are necessary to consciousness, and to possess life and brain an organic structure is indispensable; that consciousness must be physical to be connected with and influenced by physical causes.

He was a great reader of Freethought literature and the daily press. He had traveled a good deal, having been a sailor, soldier, miner in California, and in the grocery business at Key West, Florida, and was in the same business here at his death. He was a kind father to his two motherless children, his wife dying when they were quite young, 21½ years ago. He also left them with a good start in life.

THOMAS BEALE.

Not so Very Glorious.

MINDEN, NEB., Feb. 6, 295.

MR. EDITOR: How nobly the banks came to the rescue of the people in this drought stricken country by refusing to loan a dollar at any price or any security! What a blessing banks are! Then there is another combination in this State that is sacred; viz., the railroads. As soon as other States came to the rescue by sending whole train loads of provisions, clothing, and seed to the stricken people, the railroads gave out the word that on and after the 15th day of January they would haul no more freight free, as they had been doing. The consequence is that there are train loads at Lincoln held for freight, and our blessed legislators are sitting at Lincoln on their new high back chairs that they just ordered, while the people are starving and freezing for the supplies that are thus tied up. Glorious country! To-day we are having the worst blizzard that has raged over these plains since the memorable 12th of January blizzard of several years ago. No doubt there is great suffering to-day, and loss of life, too, as nothing can be exposed to this storm and live unless well prepared for it.

The Christian's God—all-powerful and all love for all his creatures, not even a sparrow can fall (if a sparrow should start to fall to-day here in Kearney County it would never strike the ground nearer than the south bluff of the Republican River), but as I was going to say, the Christian God is sitting on his throne with plenty of fire and lots of coal yet in his shed paying no attention to his people. Glorious theology! Not even his most devout followers are favored above the infidel in the same neighborhood. Hoping that you may keep battling for the right, I remain

D. S. NEWBOLD.

Slavery in America.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Feb. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: A newspaper correspondent from Rochester, N. Y., has lately given out some interesting, though scarcely new facts, regarding the "starvation wages," grudgingly doled out to the "green hands" in a well-known shirt factory of that city. I will not quote the statistics she gave, for every one who has read up on the subject at all is perfectly familiar with the rates. But the subject brought before the Woman's Club aroused universal sympathy. "What can we do?" exclaimed a member. "Of course, we must all buy this underwear. If we were to stop doing so, if it were possible to make all the women in the country refuse to buy more of it, how would that help the thousands who are slaves of the sewing machine? Even at two cents apiece for making these garments an army of experts depend upon these factories for their living, and a very fair living they make, too."

The discussion was published in several papers, and communications were received—all in condemnation of the rates paid and cruel injustice they, the employees, had met with, though not a word in defense or otherwise from the heads of industrial concerns, but in strange contradiction the same indignant journals contained advertisements from these firms for new operators.

The fact is these reformers are helpless before the great whirling, grinding mass of monopoly and can only lift their weak voices in occasional faint protest. If they would strike at its root—undermine the very foundation instead of wasting valuable time in vague cogitation, more might be accomplished.

These are social evils, ignored by the community at large and upheld by the church, which has said, "Servants, obey your masters." So long as such indifference is manifested the monopolists, strong in legislative power, will "grind the faces of the poor," and those who refuse its meager support can starve or resort to worse means as they will.

One of the saddest and most pitiable illustrations of this lamentable condition is the lives of little children being sacrificed for their parents' benefit. We thrill with horror when reading Mr. Frank G. Carpenter's accounts of cruelty in China, but many of the infamous deeds practiced in our boasted civilization, if revealed, would be enough to make that barbarous nation turn pale with envy.

It is needful that we have strong agitators for economic reform, needful that the services of every earnest person be enlisted in its behalf. Of course, "one person cannot convert the world," nor need he try, for "different ailments require different remedies," but one thing we are sure of—every one can investigate and agitate, ensuring in this manner "universal mental liberty" for the nation.

Why "The Truth Seeker" Spells Have "Hav."

NEW YORK, N. Y., Jan. 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Since THE TRUTH SEEKER is the banner Spelling Reform paper of the country, from the persistence with which for ten years or more it has uniformly spelt hav, giv, liv, etc., and many of its readers ar in the Spelling Reform ranks, I hope you will giv space to the report of the last meeting of the Spelling Reform Association. The report is made in the spellings on which the body of spelling reformers are agreed, no matter how they may differ on new alfabet.

Yours truly, ELIZA B. BURNZ.

JOINT MEETING OF LEARNED SOCIETIES IN SPELLINGS AUTHORIZED BY THE CENTURY AND STANDARD DICTIONARIES.

On December 27-29 a joint meeting was held at the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, of the American Oriental Society, Philological Association, Modern Language Association, Society of Biblical Literature, Archeological Institute, Spelling Reform Association, and other larned organizations.

The meeting of the Spelling Reform Association was held on the afternoon of the 27th inst. Prof. Francis A. March, its president, made the opening address, giving a résumé of what had been accomplished by the efforts made for improved spelling since the formation of the Association in 1876. Filologists both in England and America hav studied the subject closely and agree that no hindrance to filological research or to etymology will result from reformed orthography. Teachers and the public hav been won over to a considerable extent, and belief in the sacredness and immutability of the present orthography has been shaken. Moreover fifteen hundred spellings of common words, with from two to three silent letters omitted under definit rules, hav been incorporated as authorized spellings into the Century and Standard Dictionaries. The advance, tho slow, has been sure.

Dr. H. W. Wayland, editor of the National Baptist, gave as reasons why the reform progress so slowly: 1. Sentiment. People ar attacht to the antiquated spelling of their fathers. 2 Ignorance. Sum who profess to be scholars ar still talking about the argument on etymology, tho this argument was given up long ago by Max Muller, and all filologists worthy of the name. 3 Cowardice. 4 Selfishness. These obstacles may all be sumd up under the name of conservatism.

Dr. James W. Walk, Director of the Department of Charities and Correction, urged spelling reform on account of the benefit it would confer upon the poor. He said, truly, that a very large part of the short scoll life of poor children is taken up in teaching them our illogical and unreasonable orthography. Could we hav a sensibl spelling all this time would be saved, and, in addition, the child's mind would not be confused by a method which is obnoxious to all the rules of logic and common sense.

J. H. Allen, of Massachusetts, and Eliza B. Burnz, of New York, both of whom wer among the founders of the Association, made addresses. The latter asked, "What shal we individually do to further the reform?" She urged as a first step that all persons who favord a revision of orthography make themselves thoroly acquainted with the fifteen hundred revised spellings found in the latest dictionaries, and use more or less of them in their correspondence and publications. While not every one may possess a Century or Standard Dictionary, each can send to the Bureau of Education at Washington for a copy of the pamphlet entitled, "Circular of Information, No. 8, 1893," which contains a list of the shorter spellings and is sent free on application. This list, and the rules which govern the shorter spellings, should be studied until they can be applied when writing.

As a preparation for the general use of revised spelling, Mrs. Burnz recommended that spelling reformers should, in their respective districts, see to it that Pure Fones—that is, the study of the elements of English speech apart from letters—is thoroly taught in scools. At present the ignorance of elementary sounds is so dense that few persons, even in the teacher's profession, can unhesitatingly separate words into their vocal elements. Yet it is more important for a child to speak wel than to spel wel.

Mr. Patterson Du Bois of the Sunday School Times, made an earnest appeal that our children's intellects shall not be longer stultified by a barbarous orthography. Teachers should giv as a reason for learning the present spelling, not that it is right but that custom requires it; and offer an expectation to the child that sum day it will be made more reasonable.

Prof. C. P. G. Scott, editor of Worcester's Dictionary, closed the meeting with an address in which he said: "All the considerations of scholarship and reason ar in favor of the reform."—New York School Journal.

A Protest and a Pertinent Comparison.

CROSS PLAINS, TENN., Feb. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you a speech which I made to the county court of Robertson county on the first Monday in January. I am the only representativ of Freethought who has publicly defied theocracy in this portion of the country. I was a candidate for Superintendent of Public Instruction in this county, and one of the magistrates in my own district told me he would not vote for me because I was an Agnostic. Others voted against me for same reason. Of course his action had the effect to preclude the possibility of my election. I met the issue squarely in a five minutes' speech to the court.

W. D. CORKRAN.

SPEECH.

There is another question to which I want to call your attention—a question which I had not thought would be involved in this canvass. One of the magistrates of my own district says he will not vote for me because I am an Agnostic. This spirit is subversiv of republican institutions. Is no one not a member of the church to be allowed to hold office in this country? This is the same spirit that actuated the American Protective Association in sending delegates to the convention at Nashville pledged to vote for no Catholic. I stamp it into the earth.

In the name of common sense, in the name of honor, truth, and justice, has it come to pass in this country that the test of qualification for office is religion or no religion? Must I be deprived of the benefits to be derived from an office because, forsooth, I do not belong to the church? Are all the men in Robertson county who do not belong to the church—and there are hundreds of them—to be debarred from holding office? Are they to be deprived of their Constitutional rights as American citizens? Establish this as a precedent, and I undertake to say that no man in Robertson county who does not belong to the church can hold office. It is proscription! It is persecution!

This spirit, if it had the opportunity, would vote to debar all who dare not belong to the church from holding office, it would vote to disfranchise them, it would vote to turn the state over to the control of the church, and finally into the control of that particular church to which the member happened to belong. I scorn it! I spit upon it!

Gentlemen, it seems to me that this question should be decided upon merit. The question should be, Is he honest? Is he capable? It is not a question of religion. [Here time was called. I asked for a minute more, which was allowed.]

In conclusion, my wife's name is enrolled on the books of one of the churches in Springfield as a member. Some of those whom I see before me know this to be true. Now, because her husband is such a monstrosity as to be an Agnostic, must she be deprived of the benefits to be derived from an office, must she, indeed, and her children, because of this fact, go ragged and hungry? Has it come to this?

Gentlemen, if there is a candidate more capable, or who will discharge the duties of the office more faithfully than I, vote for him, but do not vote against me simply because I am an Agnostic. I am sorry I cannot speak longer. I wish I could talk to you an hour on this subject. [Time again called].

Is It Love of Religious Liberty?

NEENACH, CAL., Feb. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In the American Patriot, an A. P. A. paper, of Jan. 12, appeared an article headed, "Shameful Misrepresentation of the A. P. A.," being an answer to what I wrote for THE TRUTH SEEKER last October. The writer claims to be a Freethinker and is willing to shake hands with me as such, but must jeer at my confused and unrighteous ideas about the A. P. A. The writer offered to mail me a copy of the A. P. A. platform and advised me to study it. Having read hundreds of A. P. A. papers and a large quantity of their literature, it is not necessary. A liberal person unacquainted with the A. P. A. movement and just reading their platform adopted at Des Moines, is very apt to be deceived and imagine the American Protective Association to be the long sought-for panacea for theocratic despotism. But the Bible contains a good proverb, "By their fruits ye shall know them," which is applicable in this case. A person to get a correct view of this organization must read the different organs published in the interest of the order. An A. P. A.ist is imbued with the idea that the Roman Catholics are the only enemies of religious freedom. Down the Catholics, and the country is safe. He entirely ignores the attempts of the Protestants to throttle religious liberty, which, in view of their numbers, is far more dangerous.

The alleged main object of the A. P. A. is to preserve our non-sectarian public schools. That sounds very well, but what does it really mean by non-sectarian public schools? It simply means Protestant schools, where Protestant exercises and the Protestant Bible are used. To prove my assertion I will quote you a few extracts culled from the A. P. A. papers:

First, to begin with, here is the tenth plank of the state organization in Kansas, published in the American Eagle, Kansas City, Kan.

"We demand that the Bible, which has been the recognized text book of our fathers, be maintained in our public schools as the rule and guide of all moral action."

Is that plain enough? Do we want the Bible in our schools? (By the way, the president of the A. P. A. in that State is a reverend.) In the same paper was also published a historical catechism. Here is one of the questions: "Who is responsible for having the Bible taken out of our public schools?" Answer.—"The Roman Catholics." This is terrible in the eyes of an A. P. A. fanatic, but it just suits the Freethinker. In the American Citizen, published in Boston, there was an article headed "Why the Bible should be taught in our public schools." The writer began with the statement that nobody objected to the Bible in the schools but Catholics and Infidels. No, of course the A. P. A. don't want religion taught in the public schools. And to cap the climax, the A. P. A. of New Hampshire indorsed Henry W. Blair for U. S. Senator. Blair's hobby is the union of Church and State, to be effected by teaching the Christian superstition in the public schools. I believe it is proven conclusively how their organization stands on the school question.

I claim that the Catholics are not any more dangerous to our religious liberties than the Protestants, who outnumber them three to one. The Catholics are the Freethinkers' main allies in getting the Bible out of the public schools. Who has introduced all the Sunday laws in Congress? Were they Catholics? I don't know of it. We hav good evidence that their chief champion, Mr. Blair, is a member of this patriotic (?) organization. Who introduced the XVI. amendment in Congress? Was it a Catholic? Senator Gallinger and Mr. Morse are Protestants, and what is more, they are members of this A. P. A. organization, or strongly sympathize with it. The American Citizen and other A. P. A. papers, speak of their God-in-the-Constitution Twins, as the gallant defenders of American principles. It seems whenever fanatics want to introduce some particularly obnoxious laws they straightway brand it American, like our so-called American Sabbath laws.

I am not trying to defend Catholics, but the fact remains that in almost everything except the matter of public schools, they are more tolerant than the Protestants. I venture to assert that if the case was reversed, that Catholics were in the majority and controlled the schools and taught the catechism therein as the Protestants do the Bible, you would see the Protestants make the same demand for separate schools as the Catholics do. Of course there are some Freethinkers in the membership of this order. According to Supreme President Traynor, in an article in Harper's, about 11 per cent. are Freethinkers, but as 50 per cent. are church members and the others all hav Christian tendencies, it is easy enough to see which influence controls the organization. The Tocsin, an A. P. A. paper published in Los Angeles, Cal., is the only paper I hav come across which has the courage to denounce Protestant religious exercises in public schools. They are always ready, though, to denounce Catholic religious exercises. The editor of the Tocsin belongs to the 11 per cent. Another thing that strikes the Freethinker as rather suspicious is the number of reverends lecturing in favor of the A. P. A. These gentlemen of the cloth hav certainly never been noted for their zeal in the cause of religious liberty. Missouri and Kansas both hav a reverend gentleman as state president, and if we looked up the matter we would probably find a good many more sky pilots controlling the different state organizations.

The A. P. A. has a good plank in its Des Moines platform, viz: Taxation of church property. But is it sincere? I hav read various statements in their papers about how much property the Catholic church has untaxed, but very little is said about Protestant church property. As the A. P. A. claims to control the legislatures of several States, we will hav a chance to see what they mean by advocating the taxation of church property. On the whole, though, this A. P. A. movement is beneficial to Freethought, in that it divides the forces of our common enemy. This cry of unity among the Christians is simply a scheme to squelch Infidelity; but the A. P. A. movement has created a chasm between Catholics and Protestants which it will take many years to bridge. Let the fight go on; Freethought will be the gainer.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Prove Beyond a Doubt.

If ever a doubt you have in your mind,
Of anything that you may hear,
Don't pass it over as if it were so,
Especially if it seems queer.

But stop, and think for yourself for awhile,
And always keep looking about;
See why the statements you've heard are not so,
And prove them beyond your own doubt.

Marion Hepburn's Heresy.

So far her studies in philosophy had been made in the library, where no one could interrupt her, and where no one could question or scold her for her naughtiness. She had not been thrown upon the tempestuous world, there to see the stupidity, ignorance, and prejudice of the masses. She thought people who had no religion had the same opportunities, enjoyed as many benefits, and were treated as impartially as those who were religiously inclined. She had never heard of persecutions in this day of civilization. The only persecutions she knew anything about were those of the Middle Ages, of the times when martyrs suffered death because they differed from the powers that were.

When the mother of the children one day suggested to her that they ought to be taught the principles of religion, and that the creed of the Episcopal church should be explained to them, she evinced surprise. With her ideas on philosophy and morality, she could not see how teaching the children the dogmas of any creed would quicken their intellects or augment their knowledge, and she politely but firmly told the mother so.

"So you do not believe in religion," exclaimed the parent.

"Oh, no; I cannot see any reason in religion as taught by the churches to-day. I think it is something that ought to be left to the matured thought of the individual."

"Well, how can people be religious unless they are taught when their minds are in the formative stage? How can they appreciate the sublime truths which religion teaches, unless, when young, they are shown the necessity of having faith? I think it is shocking, nay, disgraceful, for one to be devoid of religion, and I pity all such people from the bottom of my heart, and pray for their salvation."

"Madam, I am sorry we have to disagree upon this subject, but it is much better for both of us that I tell you the truth. My conscience would not rest were I to say I believed in religion just for the sake of pleasing you, or to find favor with you, when I do not believe in it."

Walking over to a book case she took from one of its shelves a small prayer book and opening it turned to the "Articles of Religion."

"No doubt," she continued, "you would have your children taught from the Smaller Catechism and given lessons from the Bible, but if you really wanted your children to understand your creed they would have to understand every one of these articles. Now, the first article is one of which a child can have no comprehension, and I doubt if any man or woman can. It reads: 'There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts, or passions; of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the maker and preserver of all things, visible and invisible, etc.' Now, as the same is in the catechism, if the children were to ask me how a person without body, parts, or passions, could have goodness, wisdom, and power, how could I honestly explain it to them? And how could I tell them, should they ask me, how God preserves all things visible and otherwise, when thousands of lives are lost every day, and buildings burn and earthquakes rend portions of the globe, killing and burying thousands? I could not teach them the principles of any religion that taught such absurdities. I know I ought not to talk to you in this manner, but I really cannot help it."

"Oh, very well, since you cannot teach the children the sacred principles of religion your services will be dispensed with after to-day."

"Of course you will give me a recommendation," Miss Hepburn quietly replied.

"No, I don't see how I can; a person without religion must be without morality. I could not think of recommending you to anyone." And the speaker went out of the room leaving our young friend alone to think over the past few minutes and the strange conduct of her mistress.

The first thing to be done, now that she had been notified that her services were no longer required, was to look for a place in which to stay until another position was secured.

That evening she walked over to her aunt's, and that estimable person was more than surprised that her niece had been discharged. Of course $5 a week board was too tempting a sum to be refused, and she was on the point of giving her niece consent to reside with her, when she asked the question: "For what reason were you dismissed?"

"Because I could not bend my conscience to teach the children the articles or principles of religion, of which no one knows anything certain; and because I do not believe in religion, she said I was not wanted any longer."

"Oh, my dear child," the loving aunt hastily exclaimed, "with my family of growing children I could not have you in the house. If the neighbors knew they would point their fingers at this house and say an Infidel, an Atheist, lived here. How horribly shocking that would be! I am very sorry, but you cannot come here to stay."

So away she trudged from the inhospitable roof of her mother's sister. Along the quiet streets she wended her way, with tears almost in her eyes at the strange turn of affairs. Thoughts ran busily through her brain; the same kind of thoughts that troubled her two years ago. What could she do? What was to be done?

"Furnished rooms to let."

EDWARD DOBSON.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

His Papa Did Not Know Much.

"Papa," said little Theodore Todd, of Orange, N. J., "do you know all there is to be learned in the world?"

"O no, my little son," was the reply; "your papa knows only a few things."

"Don't other big men like you know all there is to know?"

"I think not."

"Was you ever a little baby, papa?"

"Yes; they tell me that once I was a little baby, and also a little boy like you."

"Was you ever just as big as I?"

"Yes; I suppose I was once just about your height and size."

"Well, where was you before you was a little baby?"

"I cannot tell you, my son."

"Why can't you tell me?"

"Because I do not know."

"Well, where was I when you were a little baby?"

"I do not know, my little son."

"Does anybody else know?"

"I think that no one else knows any more than I do about it."

"Don't God know all about it?"

"I cannot answer that question, my little philosopher."

"Didn't God make you grow from a little baby to a big man?"

"I grew to be a man; but I cannot explain how I grew."

"Well, if God made you grow, wouldn't you know all about it?"

"My dear little son; you ask me too hard questions. I cannot answer them."

"Seems to me, papa, you don't know much for such a big man. When I grow up as big as you I mean to know all there is to be known."

"I hope you will, my little man, I really hope that you will learn to understand all about the mysteries of life and creation."

"Mamma says that God made us all, and made everything we see. But who made God, papa?"

"No one can answer that question, my little theologian."

"What do you mean by a theologian?"

"Well, a theologian is a person who writes a discourse, or delivers a lecture, on the subject of God."

"Well, papa, if nobody has ever seen God, how do they know there is any God?"

"We don't know anything about it."

"Then, papa, what makes folks say God made everything, when they don't know whether there is a God or not?"

"You must ask me easier questions than that, for I cannot answer it correctly. Nobody knows. So I have to say I don't know anything about it."

"Well, I mean to know when I get to be a man. Well, papa, can God see in the dark and black night just as well as in the daytime?"

"I cannot answer that question. But a writer says in the Bible that the darkness and the light are alike to God."

"Then, papa, if the darkness and the daylight are alike, why can't we see in the night?"

"Your questions are too hard for me. As I and other men understand light and darkness, they are not alike."

"Well, papa, can God see everybody all over the world?"

"I don't know, my son; no one can answer that question. Your father is an Agnostic."

"O dear, I am so tired of staying in the house all such a long day! (Sunday.) Does God see you and me, papa?"

"That is another hard question which nobody can answer correctly."

"But why can't you answer it? I could answer it if I knew there was any God, and he had eyes. Well, papa, I'm such a little feller, do you think if I—if I should go out under the apple tree, and play marbles a little while, if I didn't whoop and holler, do you think God would care?"

"No, my little reasoner, I think that neither God, nor any other creature, would care, if you should play marbles, or ball, or anything else, on Sunday."

"Well, papa, what makes them call it Sunday, when the sun shines just the same on every other day?"

"Well, many hundred years ago, it is stated, people said the sun was God. So, on one day every week they would come together, and fall down on their knees and worship the sun; and pray to the sun to send them many good things, and that day they called Sunday."

"Well, the sun isn't a God, is it, papa? The sun can't talk, can it, papa? If the sun had eyes couldn't we see them?"

"My boy, you ask as many puzzling questions as little Jesus did."

Correspondence.

FORT FAIRFIELD, ME., Feb. 3, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought that I would write again as my other letter escaped the waste basket. The Baptists are holding revival meetings. I have not been, but two of my brothers have been, and quite a number of other Freethinkers go, and sit in front seats. A good many people have been converted, and many go just for fun. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is a very fine paper, and I like the Children's Corner very much. I go to school, and my studies are fourth reader, small geography, and small arithmetic. Papa doesn't want me to study grammar; he says I am not old enough. I was ten years old the fourth day of January. One of the ministers was talking to a little Freethought girl, and she told him that she did not want anything to do with his God. Yours for truth, MARRY THIS GIRL—SOMEBODY!

MR. EDITOR: I stained a blue silk dress with lemon juice; what will restore the color? I am making lots of money selling the Climax Dish Washer. Have not made less than $10 any day I worked. Every family wants a Dish Washer, and pays $5 quickly when they see the dishes washed and dried perfectly in one minute. I generally sell at every house. It is easy selling what every family wants to buy. I sell as many washers as my brother, and he is an old salesman. I will clear $3,000 this year. By addressing J. H. Nolen, 40 W. Third avenue, Columbus, Ohio, anyone can get particulars about the Dish Washer, and can do as well as I am doing. Talk about hard times; you can soon pay off a mortgage, when making $10 a day, if you will only work; and why won't people try when they have such good opportunities?

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address: F. J. THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,

with a preface by

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Bible and Evolution.

By Arthur B. Moss.

Of this valuable book the London "Free-thinker" says: "It is by far the best production of Mr. Moss's pen, and we heartily recommend it as an excellent text-book of the subject. The manner is good, and the style is bright. The reader is carried along on an easy-flowing stream of science, history, ethics, and common-sense."

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. RELIGION AND THE BIBLE. By F. D. Cummings. New York: The Truth Seeker Co. Cloth, pp. 314. 50 cents.

From the standpoint of the Liberal, this book is thoughtful and furnishes ample argument in his favor. It is well written, concise, clearly stated and shows care in its arrangement.

THE BETTER WORLD. By E. B. Southwick, M. D. New York: The Truth Seeker Co. Cloth, pp. 375. 50 cents.

This is an effort to show a people enjoying itself; men and women are equal in every respect, working, playing, studying together, without selfishness or personal ambition. This story is interesting, but the object of the author, if one reads between the lines, is to amuse his readers, and distract the mind from the unhappy events which so often come to the lot of nearly every one in the world.—Banner of Light.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: Was he a Christian? By John E. Rensburg. Truth Seeker Co., 28 Lafayette Place, New York. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

The motto of Ohas. Bradlaugh was "thorough." Mr. Rensburg may as fairly wear it on his escutcheon—if he has one. The question as to Lincoln's religious belief was raised by one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, and seemingly would not down, but Mr. Rensburg's book is based on fifteen years' work in collecting evidence from over 120 witnesses, and as the ratio is 100 to 20 that Lincoln was not a professed Christian, not accepting its vital and distinctive dogmas, it looks as though Mr. Rensburg had thoroughly settled the question, but such matters are becoming, perhaps, impossible to settle when the status of a man to-day, like Dr. Briggs, himself claiming to be a Christian, is in dispute. Mr. Rensburg's effort to find out the truth has discovered many interesting bits of biography of Lincoln hardly to be found in other more pretentious works.—Foot's Health Monthly.

TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL FOR 1895 received and I am real glad to see this valuable publication renewed. I had sent off all my old copies save one to friends, who wished to see specimens of it. I kept one for the calendar record of births, deaths, and notable events concerning Liberals and Liberalism. The issue of 1895 is worth 25 cents for this department alone. Ingersoll, Mrs. Gage, Susan H. Wixon, Helen Gardener, and indeed all its contributors, have excellent articles in it. It ought to sell like hot cakes, and I hope it will. Among our good resolves for the New Year we should make a strong one that we will do all we can to promote Liberal thought and Liberal work; and especially aid our prominent public workers who breast the storm and bravely pave the way for our progress.—Elmina Drake Stenker.

Many books have been written of late years on phrenology. The "Brain and the Bible" deals with that subject, and also with the position of religion on the various theories of the mind. The author maintains very liberal views, and this book will be antagonized by orthodox religionists. It discusses in fearless manner the established opinions of religion, and boldly throws down the gauntlet to the champions of unquestioning faith. The author is a necessitarian. Causes, operating before birth, combined with environment, produce certain formations of the brain, and these limit and modify thought. Mental attributes, like physical attributes, are inherited. Character, morality—conceptions of right and wrong, have their origin in the same manner. Man can no more make himself perfect morally than he can make himself an intellectual giant. This is the scientific doctrine applied to the current religion of to-day.

The whole work warmly advocates Free-thought. The introduction is by R. G. Ingersoll, and is written in his usual brilliant style. The book is for sale by the Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York.—Economist (Montesano), Wash.

"A Tale of a Halo" by Morgan A. Robertson, is the title of a story in verse which could have been written by no one but a hardened skeptic. As a literary effort it has points to commend it, the author daringly violating the prescribed rules of rhyme in order to attain smoothness of composition and directness of style. As a result, although the poetic attribute has been slighted somewhat, the story reads from beginning to end with the rippling flow of rhythmical prose. The story, briefly, is of Beelzebub's expedition to the heavenly city in the guise of a newcomer

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Free-thought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

from earth. By his polished manner and clinching arguments he induces St. Peter to admit him. Inside, by the same procedure, he secures an outfit and halo which eclipses all the rest. Envy and discontent follow, and at this point he is recognized and denounced by the archangel Michael. Resuming his natural shape of a fiend, he proceeds to turn heaven into a pandemonium, but is subdued and ejected at last by the sign of the cross, made by St. Patrick. A reader who reveres the angels and saints, even though only as religious symbols, will not relish this book, for the characters are earthly and of things earthly. St. Peter with his pipe and dissipated habits, the pitiful jealousy of the other saints, St. Patrick with his rich brogue and pugnacious temperament, and the lofty and martial Michael, archangel and chief of the heavenly army, with his intrepid courage and strong sense of duty, marred by a weak dislike of St. Peter, make a combination calculated to rob them of much of their divinity. Possibly, this is the author's intent, for he has followed the unconscious example of Milton and made his devil tower above them all in grandeur and nobility of character. If the saintly keeper of the heavenly gate is really the character described in this book, we doubt that the author will succeed in passing in, but his friends may draw some consolation from the hope that, having spoken well of Beelzebub, his existence in the infernal regions will be made as easy as is consistent with divine justice.—"Mediator" in Brooklyn Eagle.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Gems of Thought.

KINDNESS means as with your child, so with your servant, not indulgence but care.—Ruskin.

How is the great problem of existence piled on existence, that we see everywhere about us, solved by the unknown quantity of deity?—Investigator.

THE superstitious man is to the knave what the slave is to the tyrant; nay, further, the superstitious man is governed by the fanatic, and becomes one.—Voltaire.

FREEDOM is not murder. It is salvation. It is not dynamite. It is the offered hand. It needs not to slay to convince. It gives vision and gentleness. It persuades him who is permitted to choose evil that he dares not choose evil because evil is of no avail as against the soul's providence.—Horace L. Traubel.

GENERAL truths, to be of due and permanent use, must be earned. "Easy come easy go," is a saying as applicable to knowledge as to wealth. While rules, lying isolated in the mind—not joined to its other contents as outgrowths from them—are continually forgotten, the principles which those rules express piecemeal, become, when once reached by the understanding, enduring possessions.—Herbert Spencer.

VOLTAIRE's great work was to have done more than any other man on record to make the instinct of cruelty not only detestable, but ludicrous; and so to accomplish what the holiest and the wisest of saints and philosophers had failed to achieve—to attack the most hideous and pernicious of human vices with a more effective weapon than preaching and denunciation—to make tyrants and torturers look not merely horrible and hateful, but pitiful and ridiculous.—A. C. Swinburne.

Or course, society has the right to protect itself, no matter whether the persons who attack its well-being are responsible or not, no matter whether they are sick in mind, or deformed in brain. The right of self-defense exists, not only in the individual, but in society. The great question is, How shall this right of self-defense be exercised? What spirit shall be in the nation, or in society—the spirit of revenge, a desire to degrade and punish and destroy, or, a spirit born of the recognition of the fact that criminals are victims? The world has thoroughly tried confiscation, degradation, imprisonment, torture, and death, and thus far the world has failed.—Ingersoll.

The spirit of persecution that inspired legal action against Whitman's poems in Boston, thereby depriving the poet of the greater part of his income, and forcing the authors of England to come to his rescue with financial aid, is the same old diabolical instinct that provided Nero with his living candles, and Torquemada with his twelve thousand bonfires of human flesh; it is the spirit of Cyril, murderer of gentle Hypatia; the temper of mind that lighted the fagots around Giordano Bruno, and slowly roasted to death the body of Michael Servetus; that hung the witches of Salem and the Quakers of Boston; and to-day knouts, exiles, and gibbets the noble patriot-Nihilists of Russia; it is the spirit

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

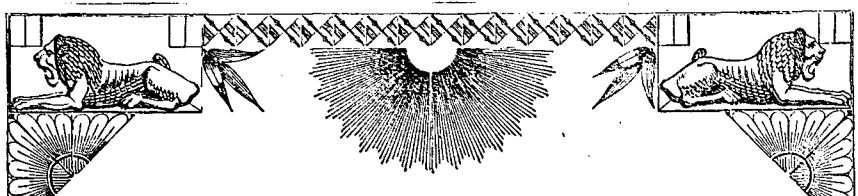

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies	1.00
Fifty copies	4.50
One hundred copies	8.00

Larger quantities at special rates.

that murdered Lovejoy and John Brown, remanded Thomas Sims and Anthony Burns to slavery, and branded in the hand with a hot iron Captain Jonathan Walker, of Massachusetts, for helping the fugitive slave to escape.—Wm. Sloane Kennedy.

The judges of Athens put Socrates to death on the ground that his opinions tended to corrupt the youth of that city. The High Court of Jerusalem sentenced Jesus to death on similar grounds. Practical Pilate asked, "What evil hath he done?"—but he got no answer. Jesus had done no evil; he had only advanced opinions which the majority considered subversive of the moral foundations of society. And, in short, there is no persecution, no oppression of conscience, no massacre in history which may not be justified on the principle that you may punish a man for the evils which may be imaginatively and prospectively attributed to the influence of his opinions. Nay, all contemporary discussion of vital problems, all new ideas, are thus placed at the mercy of nervous apprehension.—Moncure D. Conway.

The one argument that bigotry is never able to answer is the argument of a loving heart found outside its petty inclosures. The dogmatist confesses the thing most to be feared is the consistently good life of a heretic. The Christian scheme of exclusiv salvation through the atoning blood of Jesus holds for many minds until they are brought face to face with a prophet soul like Mozoomdar, until they humbly confess their own spiritual poverty in the presence of the gentle dignity and humane presence of a benignant dark-skinned pagan like Dharmapala; then they are dumb. The triumphant peace that gathers around a manly life, as in the fullness of years it approaches the mysterious realm without the aid of priest or sacrament, breaks down the stoutest walls of sectarian narrowness, throws over the partitions between creed and character.—Unity.

COLUMBIAS FOR 1895.

A Highly Artistic Catalogue Sets Forth the Merits of these Famous Bicycles.

Noted artists occasionally condescend to lend their aid to make a trade catalogue beautiful, and this has evidently been the case with the new handbook of Columbia bicycles, just issued. From the rich and striking cover to the last of the dainty sketches that adorn the broad margins, the tell-tale marks that show the hand of well-known contributors to Life, Vogue, and the leading magazines are everywhere apparent. The ideas skillfully carried out in the illustrations is that of sport and travel. The book will long be preserved as one of the handsomest art works of the year. It is as little like the ordinary trade catalogue as well can be, and yet it cleverly tells of the merits of Columbia bicycles for 1895, and also of lower-priced machines, Hartford. No lover of bicycling or of beautiful books should neglect sending for the Columbia Catalogue. It can be had by calling upon Columbia agents, or it will be sent by mail for two 2-cent stamps. Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

The Work and Designs of the Theocrats.

The New England convention of the National Reform Association was in session in Boston on February 19th and 20th. It was held, as stated in the call, because, among other things, of

"The subtle and persevering attempts which are made to prohibit the reading of the Bible in our public schools, to overthrow our Sabbath laws, to corrupt the family, to abolish the oath, prayer in our national and state legislatures, days of fasting and thanksgiving, and other Christian features of our institutions, and thus to divorce the American government from all connection with the Christian religion."

By the phrase "to corrupt the family" is meant the regulation of marriage and divorce by the civil power, entirely independent of ecclesiastical regulations, as such. Ominous of disaster to civilization if the theocrats should triumph, were these subjects, among others, discussed by the convention: "The Necessity of Union among Denominations for Certain Phases of Christian and Reform Work"; "How to Influence Legislation in these Reform Movements"; "A Uniform National Divorce Law"; "The Right and Duty of the Government to Teach the Foundation Principles of the Christian Religion in the Public Schools"; "Shall the Government of this Nation Recognize Christ as King?"

On February 25th and 26th the annual convention of the Cumberland Valley Sabbath Association was held at Newville, Pa. Rev. W. J. Robinson talked about "The Great Conspiracy against the Sabbath in this Country," but he said nothing in criticism of the great conspiracy against human liberty and social justice in which he is an industrious schemer. Rev. J. W. Bain asked the question, "What day of the week was, and is, the Christian Sabbath?" It was easy to answer that Sunday is that day, for the Christian Catholic church ordained that the first should take the place of the seventh day of the week, but if Mr. Bain had asked which was the Bible Sabbath he would have been compelled to admit that it was Saturday. Rev. Mr. Leiper discussed "The Civil Sabbath," a pure fiction, and other preachers talked about "Sabbath desecration," "The Sabbath Law for the Foreigner," who is the terror of the Sundayite, and related aspects of the question.

At the New Castle theocratic convention Rev. H. H. George delivered an address on "The Duties of the Church to the State." The title is a wholly misleading one, for the address deals exclusively with the alleged duties of the state to the church. But this contradiction, flat and unqualified as it is, is not more irreconcilable than that between Mr. George's first proposition and all the others. The first reads as follows:

"I. It is the duty of the state to recognize the independent authority of the church."

Under this head Mr. George maintains that the union of church and state "is the violation of the law of relationship which God has established." "These two institutions," he continues, "are radically distinct in their spheres, and each absolutely independent of the other." Illustrating his argument, he says:

"The Pope of Rome has no civil supremacy, and the sovereign of England has no ecclesiastical headship. All such claims are usurpations, and, God helping us, they shall never obtain a foothold in the United States."

To one not familiar with the sinuosities of theocratic argumentation and propagandism that undoubtedly has a very satisfactory sound, but to the practiced ear of the Freethought sentinel it rings hollow with deceit and contemplated treachery. How misleading it is will be seen upon reading the remainder of the Rev. Mr. George's propositions:

- "II. The state is to be subservient to the church.
- "III. The state should profess the true Christian religion.
- "IV. The state should require scriptural qualifications in her rulers.
- "V. The state should restrain practices that are injurious to religion.
- "VI. The state should maintain a true standard of morals.
- "VII. The state should protect the church.
- "VIII. The state should support the church by timely gifts."

And yet Mr. George has the sublime audacity to assert that he and his party stand for the separation of church and state! But let us glance briefly at some of these propositions: Evidently Mr. George had a suspicion that "subservient" would grate harshly on the ears of the people who have been taught from childhood that the state should be independent of the church, and so he added—"Not subject; not even subordinate, but subservient." This is mere hair-splitting. Of "subservient" Webster says: "Fitted or disposed to subserve; useful in an inferior capacity, serving to promote some end; subordinate." The italics are ours. Comments would be superfluous.

Under V we are told that the practices which should be suppressed because they are injurious to religion include "blasphemy, idolatry, and Sabbath desecration." This implies that if the theocrats could have their way we should be ground down under not only Sabbath laws but a new set of blasphemy statutes. Dr. Schaff is quoted as saying that the republic rests on three pillars, "The church of God, the book of God, and the day of God." The conclusion is drawn that "the state is bound by the law of self-preservation to see that the church of God is protected in the undisturbed use of the day of God." This shows again of how little worth is the pretense of the Sabbatarians that they want Sunday set apart as a day of rest for the people. Here it is distinctly admitted that they want a monopoly of it for the benefit of the "church of God." More than this: If the state is bound to protect the "day of God" from the desecration of work and recreation, is it not logically and equally bound to protect the "book of God" from the desecration of criticism? Of course, and that is why "blasphemy" is one of the "practices that are injurious to religion" which the state is under obligation to suppress. Mr. George concludes this section of his address with the significant assertion that "the United States mail service is a direct assault by the state upon the church." Again "the poor laborer" is forgotten.

From the argument under VI. we learn that the state can maintain a "true standard of morals" only by keeping the Bible in the common schools, for "as the only true religion is Christianity, which the state is bound to profess, so the only true standard of morals is the Bible, which the state is bound to teach." What would become of liberty and equity in a country ruled by men capable of writing such wild absurdities as these? Under VII. it is gravely stated that the magistrate is armed with the sword, and "it has no more sacred use in his hands than the defense of the church of Christ." When individuals are sacrificed to institutions, their instruments, it is time that the institutions were destroyed or remodeled. Mr. George wants the Christian nations of the world to wipe out the Turkish power, not because the latter has murdered helpless people, but because the people it has killed were Christians. In his own words, he wants the church protected, not the people. As to the other demands he has made, they are so glaringly ecclesiastical on their face that no exegesis is necessary. All Freethinkers and other Americans who love freedom for themselves and desire that equal justice be the heritage of their children, regardless of belief, will not fail to work early and late to defeat the machinations of these enemies of the secular civil republic. With them in undisputed possession of power in the nations of the world, the midnight of the Dark Ages would settle once more upon the earth.

Upon What Trash They Are Fed!

We wonder sometimes if the rank and file of the Christian army are as stupid as their leaders assume them to be. The refuse that is doled out to them for intellectual rations is so trashy and indigestible that it is a wonder that they have not all died of indigestion of the brain. We find in a country paper printed in Indiana a pretty little story about Colonel Ingersoll and Schuyler Colfax which must make the Sunday-school children marvel at the silliness of the great Agnostic, so skillfully is the yarn made to tell against the supposition that he has ordinary common sense. It is seriously stated that, "a few years before the death of Colfax, the two men met on a train in Illinois," when, "according to an exchange," a conversation took place, the substance of which is given below: Colonel Ingersoll said to the Indiana statesman: "Colfax, in ten years nobody will believe the infamous religious doctrines you believe now." Think of a sane Freethinker, a man of wide and keen observation, making such an assertion as is here put into the mouth of the Agnostic! Colonel Ingersoll would be one of the last men to cherish the delusiv hope that in ten years or fifty or one hundred years there would be left no believers in the superstitions of Christianity. He realizes that progress is a matter of growth, not the result of a cataclysm. No man who knew anything about Liberalism would have invented such a story. How ignorant the prevaricator was the rest of the tale will reveal in a still more glaring light. Colfax is reported to have made this ridiculous speech:

"I do not wish to debate with you on a train, but I will make one remark and ask you one question. I suppose that when you call my creed infamous that is Freethought, but if I should call your doctrines infamous, that would be bigotry. Here is a mother caressing the golden ringlets of her babe; her face radiant with divine mother love. The infant is smitten by the untimely frost of death, and the mother's heart is broken. As she sees the little coffin lowered in the grave the only hope and comfort she has is the thought that she will some day meet the baby in heaven. You are trying to take away that hope and comfort. What are you going to give her in return?"

How like a minister that sounds! And what answer do you suppose Ingersoll made to the foolish stuff? Why, he "was pale and quiet for a moment, and then throwing himself back in his seat said: 'Colfax, let us talk politics.'" If the preacher who got up this "Infidel-killer" had undertaken deliberately to stamp his production with the ineffaceable brand of falsehood he could not have done so more effectually than he has in his appalling stupidity. Did he not have sense enough to see that the first thought to shape itself in the mind of a Freethinker asked such a nonsensical question would be, "What comfort can the mother who believes in hell derive from her faith when her 'unsaved' child lies before her in death?" and that is what Colonel Ingersoll would have asked Schuyler Colfax had the latter so far parted with his reasoning faculties as to propound the inane conundrum attributed to him by the pious romancer. As Dr. Albert Barnes, the great divine, said, when contemplating the problem of evil and the eternal death of the finally impenitent, "All is dark, dark, and there is no ray of light to reveal why evil came into the world." Millions of thoughtful and tender-hearted Christians have echoed this cry of despair, and yet here is a story going the rounds of the press, telling how Colonel Ingersoll was dumfounded when confronted with one of the most trite, threadbare, and jejune of the stock "posers" of the Christian apologist. It is wonderful how men who claim to be the only divinely commissioned teachers of morality can persist in the coinage and circulation of slanders and preposterous stories which they know can obtain credence only among the most superstitious and ignorant portion of the people.

In the same Indiana paper there is an article, evidently contributed by the local clergyman, in praise of the revival meeting then in progress in the village. The writer says that a revival is a blessing to any place, because religion in a man makes him a better citizen. There must be some mistake about this, for the experience of the world goes to show that the more nearly a man is filled with the spirit of god the more trouble he is to his neighbors, and the more likely he is to disturb the peace of the world. At least, that appears to be the effect of that kind of religion known as the Christian. Often the milk of human kindness in a man is turned to acid when he becomes tainted with the poison of religious zeal. Again, he may treat you all right until he learns that you do not sacrifice at the same altar with him, and then he turns on you like a beast of prey and rends you with tooth and claw. We will take our chances with the "man of the world" every time, in preference to the devout Christian who believes that his god is going to burn us forever in hell because we cannot agree with him concerning the trinity and the personality of the devil. The man who thinks that his god is this kind of an unreasoning and unmerciful tyrant is very apt to want to curry favor with him by giving us a taste in this world of the punishment he expects to have the pleasure of seeing us suffer in the next.

Enumerating the things that the Christian will not do, this writer says that he will not profane the day of the Lord. Does he really believe that the day it is performed on makes any difference in the essential nature of an act? And if he does not think it right to work or enjoy himself on "the day of the Lord" why does he not keep Saturday? That is the only Sabbath for which he has Bible sanction, while Sunday is so far from being the "Lord's day" that it is the day of the Catholic church. He is a Protestant, and consequently repudiates the authority of that "scarlet woman"; why, then, does he take his holy day from her? Drunkenness, buying and selling liquors, and drinking them, are some others of the offenses of which the Christian will not be guilty. But your Bible does not justify you in taking this stand; some of the old worthies, who were especial favorites of its author, were in the habit of getting drunk, and there are in it ten passages which excuse, commend, or command the use of intoxicants, to each one which condemns their use. Slave holding, buying or selling slaves, are also, if this writer is to be believed, unchristian acts. But the Bible does not condemn slavery; Paul returned a fugitive slave to his master, and Christian nations have, until very recently, been slaveholding nations. In our own country the churches were the last to get into line for freedom, and to-day, in the South, the churches will not fellowship brother Christians who were lately slaves, thus showing that Christianity does not place its accepters in the front ranks of progress, does not, in fact, raise them above the level of popular prejudice and injustice. "Fighting, quarreling, brawling, brother going to law with brother, returning evil for evil." But Christians are past masters in all these accomplishments; they are, par excellence, the fighting nations of the globe; as Colonel Ingersoll has said, in substance, the Christian nations of Europe keep constantly five million men under arms for the purpose of blowing Christian brains into eternal froth. Christians are the leaders in all "jingo" crusades against the weak tribes and nations of the "heathen" world; in England it has happened time and again that the voices of Freethinkers were heard almost alone in protest against some peculiarly atrocious act of spoliation and slaughter committed or contemplated by the government of that country; the missionaries and the "sons of the missionaries" can generally be counted on to "cry aloud and spare not" when the quarry is the "savage," especially if he has rich lands and many cattle. The religious man not only returns evil for evil, but he is much given to returning evil for good, as the terrible history of Christian persecution abundantly proves.

"Doing not to others as we would not have them do unto us." All unprejudiced, observing people know that this is a rule which the ardent religionist honors in the breach rather than in the observance. Would he wish others to imprison, exile, torture, behead, hang, and burn him and his as he has imprisoned, exiled, tortured, beheaded, hung, and burned millions who differed from him in opinion concerning unprovable dogmas and disputed ethical codes? Would he like to be compelled to pay taxes on the property of associations in whose objects he did not believe? Would he wish to be forced to observe a holy day which he did not accept? Where has the representative Christian abstained from doing to others what he would not have others do unto him, when those others have been of diverse creed or alien race?

"Religion stands for all that is high and noble, good and pure, and is the guide of the gentle and patient. A man who believes there is a God and that there will be a time of reckoning in the world to come, when man shall be punished and rewarded according to his deeds here on earth, will not be as likely to shed the life blood of his fellow man, as the man who says within his heart there is no God, neither everlasting punishment in the world to come."

The reverse of this is much nearer the truth—as a rule it is true that the more implicit the faith of the man or nation in the dogma of eternal vengeance the more cruel, remorseless, and bloodthirsty that man or nation. Cruel deities imply cruel devotees; the man who believes that his god will torture his enemies forever will be very apt to begin the work for him in this world, especially if the enemies of his god happen to be also the enemies of the worshiper. This gives a splendid opportunity to gratify the spirit of revenge and credit the crime to piety, thus augmenting his heavenly bank account while getting troublesome people out of his way in this world. On the other hand, the lover of his kind who is at the same time an acceptor of this awful creed, is moved to become a persecutor because he reasons, and reasons logically from his premises, that it is better that a few should die under brief torture here than that they should live to spread their heresies, and thus send to hell, to suffer eternal torture, multitudes of their fellows, among them, perhaps, some near and dear to the inquisitor himself. No, belief in eternal punishment has sharpened infinitely more murderous knives than it has dulled or broken.

The Letter-Writing Corps.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week try to secure a hearing in the Republican, of Montezuma, Iowa. Recently the editor declared that the liberty that Ingersoll "takes to criticize the book of books is granted him by the same Christianity that he abhors so much"; and following this stupendous assertion come others equally astounding:

"The principles he represents never accomplished anything for humanity. His votaries never built a hospital, erected a college, nor founded an asylum for the unfortunate. No spires point to the skies as monuments to the doctrine promulgated. Infidelity can point to no civilization as the outgrowth of its teaching. It professes to hate the Christian religion and can find all manner of discrepancies in it, but it has nothing to offer in its stead. It proposes nothing to better the condition of humanity. Without a hope and without a faith it appeals to none of the tender sensibilities of the human heart. The Bible he professes to hate has survived the denunciation of kings and potentates and never was more popular than now."

"Bruno" replied in a fair and able article of some more than a column, which the editor printed in a good position, and to which he made an attempt to reply. The editor's statement that Infidelity had never founded a college was answered by "Bruno" with the citation of Lick's and Girard's contributions to science and education, notably the former's gift for the construction of the Mt. Hamilton observatory, and he incidentally remarked that this was a bequest for the promulgation of science. Probably the editor had never heard of Lick or his work, for he speaks of the observatory as "Lick University," and avers that "Bruno" "upsets his argument completely when he says that this institution was endowed for the promulgation of science and in no way to further the advancement of Infidel belief." How complete an evasion this is of the issue made by the editor himself the members of the Corps will see by reference to the foregoing quotation from his initial article. For the secular position regarding education see THE TRUTH SEEKER for Feb. 16, 1895, page 107. Passing over many wild assertions of the Republican, we quote the concluding paragraph as furnishing a particularly good text for your letters:

"Ingersoll's tirade is devoted very largely to Moses. Ingersoll is a good lawyer, but Moses knew more law in a minute than he ever knew and gave to the world a code that has stood the test of time and has met the universal approval of the good people of all ages. We refer to the Ten Commandments—that standard of moral ethics that became the basis of the laws of the civilized world."

If Moses gave the Ten Commandments to the world what becomes of the alleged authorship of God? Why praise Moses for the laws written by the finger of God, as the Christian assumes? The Commandments are not the basis for the laws of the civilized world, for no civilized nation would to-day venture to enforce more than half of them. Where is the evidence that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, or, rather, the Hexateuch? And, finally, all ethical codes are the product of human experience, and the main moral commands incorporated in the Ten Commandments were old before the Bible, or any part of it, was written. These are some of the best points to make in your communications, but, of course, you are not restricted to them. The editor's name is J. W. Jarnagin.

A bad law may slumber in "innocuous desuetude" for years, but it is always capable of harm, and is never "dead" until it is repealed. In Louisville on Feb. 14, H. Stratmann was arraigned before Judge Thompson for violation of the Sabbath law. There were two charges against him, one for "being found at his calling on the Sabbath day," and the other for "keeping open bar on the Sabbath day." The prosecuting attorney was aided by another lawyer, but Mr. Stratmann did not employ counsel, and he declined to cross-examine the prosecuting witness; in fact, he admitted the truth of both charges. Told that he could have a jury, he waived the right, saying that he could trust the judge to give him justice. The witness for the state was a theological student in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. He testified that he had seen the defendant sell various articles in his store on Sunday, including liquor, the bar being in the rear end of the grocery. Mr. Stratmann testified in his own behalf that he had been in this country nine years and had always sold on Sunday, the same as on other days; he did not know there was any law against it. "Yes," he said, "I have sold liquors on Sunday. Every barroom sells on Sunday; my neighbors and all sell on Sunday. Could I move to another place and sell on Sunday?" The judge informed him that the law applied to all parts of Louisville, but the police did not enforce it. As the law exempts seventh-day observers, he was asked if he kept any other day as a Sabbath. "No," he answered, "I keep the Sabbath. I go to church every Sunday; I never miss." He was fined five dollars on the first charge and ten dollars on the second. Here is a law so feebly enforced that a man has violated it every Sunday for nine years and did not know that such a statute was in existence. Now he is brought up and robbed of his earnings at the instigation of a divinity student. And he is a Christian, but, as it happens, a Christian who minds his own business instead of that of his neighbors. The Courier-Journal says that several preachers and church people were present, "all of whom seemed pleased at the result." No doubt; that is what delights the heart of the priest; he glories in the persecution of the dissenter. The lesson of such trials and verdicts was stated in the beginning of this paragraph—a bad law can be effectually disposed of only by abrogation. One thought as to another lesson: We hear nowadays a great deal of thoughtless talk about the increase of crime, as measured by the progressive numbers of "criminals." All such statistics are worthless unless we are given the items. In the report of proceedings in the City Ordinance Court of Louisville for the day when Mr. Stratmann was convicted we find that there were eight cases before Judge Thompson. Two of these we have detailed; two men were branded as "unlicensed dealers," another was guilty of keeping an "unlicensed hearse," and still another of driving an "unlicensed wagon." Here are six misdemeanors out of eight in one day in one court which are purely fictitious or manufactured offenses, and yet they all count in the grand total of "convictions." What are such figures worth as an index to the moral status of the people? Nothing.

The New York Herald, referring to Pope Leo's encyclical, says of his "life-long desire" to see the world "brought into one fold and under one shepherd," that it is "a Utopian dream, perhaps, but one worth the dreaming." Pray all the gods that it may never be more than a dream! The world has seen enough of the "one fold and one shepherd" business. If the reunion of Christendom were consummated to-day the knell of civilization would sound to-morrow. The Herald adds that the encyclical is "especially interesting as reflecting the kindly spirit of the venerable ruler of the church and his touching anxiety to see the world come to rest under the shelter of the one saving church." "The one saving church"! We understand that the religious stuff that appears in the editorial columns of the Herald is written by a Protestant minister, the Rev. Mr. Hepworth. Has he forgotten that Protestantism was the revolt of the victims of the intolerable oppression of the "one saving church"? What are his grounds for hope that any church, be it Catholic, or Presbyterian, or Methodist, if given undivided power, would not reduce the world again to the pitiable plight it was in for centuries before the Reformation or that Scotland was in when Presbyterianism held the reins of authority, or England when under the heel of the Episcopal hierarchy? Are freedom-loving men mad that they should desire the realization of the dream of the Universal Church? Are the lessons of history—written in human blood with a pen of flame—utterly without meaning to them?

In Michigan, State Senator MacLaughlin has introduced a bill intended to close up about everything on Sunday. The chances seem to be in favor of its passage. Will our friends in that state send us at once the fullest and most accurate information concerning it which is attainable? We want a copy of the bill and desire to know how far it has progressed through committees and toward third reading. In Detroit a strong effort is being made to shut everything but the churches on Sunday. The Sunday battle is on everywhere and we must fight for our citizen rights or lose the last of them that the church wants to ravish.

Perhaps some of our readers have not called the attention of their friends to the fact that we make several attractive premium offers to both new and old subscribers, the most conspicuous of which is the proposition to send Putnam's splendid work, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which sells for $5, and THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year for the sum of only $6.50. Send us four yearly subscribers at regular rates ($3 per year, $12 in all) and we will send you free a copy of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." That is a premium worth the effort. For further particulars see page 146.

On March 1 the Judiciary Committee of the Massachusetts Senate unanimously reported a bill providing as specified below:

"Whoever is present at a game of sport, a play, or any public diversion except a concert of sacred music, upon the Lord's day, shall be fined $5 for each offense. A fine not exceeding $50 is to be imposed upon any person keeping open his place of business, except for work of necessity or charity, or taking part in sports, games, or plays. Punishment of from $50 to $500 is provided for the proprietor or manager of such entertainment. Another section forbids mayors, aldermen, and selectmen to grant licenses for exhibitions of any description on the Lord's day. Another section expressly excepts sacred concerts, which may be given without a license."

As will be seen at once, this proposed law goes a step beyond any state statute now in existence—so far as we are aware—in that it makes attendance at theatrical and other entertainments a misdemeanor. Heretofore punishment has been inflicted only on the participants. And it is a committee of lawyers that favors this monstrous reversion. Poor old Massachusetts! The next thing we know some fossil legislative committee will recommend the adoption of a law embodying the proposal made the other day in the German Reichstag by Dr. Rintelen:

"He gave notice that he would move an amendment to the Anti-Revolution bill imposing a fine of 600 marks and imprisonment for two years upon any person who in a public speech or in writing denied the existence of God or the immortality of the soul, or in any way attacked the religious character of the marriage relation."

Whither are we drifting, and what is to be the end?

At a recent meeting of the Presbyterian Union of this city Rev. Dr. Duffield, in a discourse on "Americanism," declared that "the man who assails the Bible is un-American." The gentleman is certainly mistaken: The Bible is not an American book in any sense; it was not written by Americans; it is not the record of the doings of an American or of Americans; the commands which it contains were not issued by an American or by Americans, nor for Americans, and hence we do not see how Dr. Duffield, as a loyal American, can ask or expect other loyal Americans to obey the commands of foreign princes or courts, or accept the unsupported assertions of "alien" scribes, of scribblers who could not get the most humble job from this city to-day, but would have to wait five years for their naturalization papers. Away with this un-American conjuring book! we are too patriotic to invest in intellectual antiquities manufactured by the pauper brains of Asia and Europe. Give us an American Bible and American gods and saviors. Dr. Duffield is afflicted with a mania for foreign ghosts and miracles; he is under grave suspicion of disloyalty to American institutions.

Perhaps the most substantial evidence of Colonel Ingersoll's triumph in the cause of free speech is furnished in the statement made to THE TRUTH SEEKER by Manager C. A. Davis, of 1293 Broadway—that since last Tuesday he has received an entirely unprecedented number of applications for Colonel Ingersoll from all parts of the country, and if the demands keep up much longer at the pace they are now coming in he would have no difficulty in booking the colonel for a lecture for every night in the next twenty-five years.

We learn with extreme regret of the death of John McGlashan, of Ukiah, Cal. His funeral took place on February 4th, being wholly secular in character. "The Truth Seeker Collection" was used in the services, and a few appropriate remarks were made by L. F. Long, the old-time friend of the dead Freethinker. John McGlashan did good work in life and at his death he told the world that the true man needs not the assistance of the priest or the shield of the sacrament to enable him to pass away in peace.

Since the last acknowledgment was made we have received the following contributions to the Free Sunday Fund: Ralph Helm, $1; Gilbert Lincoln, $15; Stephen Brewer, $1. New and more severe Sunday laws are imminent in Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Massachusetts, and several other states. The fight is now on in the legislatures of all those named; we must flood them with the right kind of literature—will you not help us now?

We hope that all our friends will make a determined effort to fill at least once that trial subscription blank on page 146, this issue. THE TRUTH SEEKER is sent three months on trial for the small sum of fifty cents. This offer gives an excellent opportunity to introduce the paper into tens of thousands of homes and offices where Freethought literature has not often penetrated, if ever. Will you send us such a list?

Evidently the New York Times has a suspicion that it is not exactly safe for the Rev. Mr. Beatty, who tried to send Colonel Ingersoll to prison because he was going to lecture in Hoboken, to be at large. It says that "his bumps should be felt by the common phrenologist under circumstances of the utmost possible publicity."

HOBOKEN MINISTERS ALARMED.

They Appeal to the Strong Arm of the Law

TO SUPPRESS COL. INGERSOLL

They Couldn't Trust Their God in a Fair Fight with the Infidel, So They Hunted Up a Moldy New Jersey Statute and Tried to Make It Operative in This Year of Man 295.

Hoboken is a New Jersey village across the North river from this city. It is one of the treasures of the funny paragrapher, who has a fancy for "touching it off" with Oshkosh, Kalama-zoo, and Hawville. Of course there are many sensible people in the town, but its ministers of the gospel do all they can to justify the reputation made for it by the humorous papers; so when it was announced that Colonel Ingersoll would deliver his great lecture on the Bible, in the Hoboken theater, on Sunday, Feb. 24, the divines proceeded to give a free exhibition of their asinine ears. The moving spirit in the farce was Rev. Henry T. Beatty of the first Presbyterian church. He got two other preachers and a benighted layman to join him in his attempt to stay the sweeping torrent of Free-thought. They held a conference on Saturday, burrowed into the statute books of New Jersey, and found this precious relic of the old blue law days:

If any person shall wilfully blaspheme the holy name of God by denying, cursing, or contumeliously reproaching his being or providence, or by cursing or contumeliously reproaching Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost, or the Christian religion, or the holy word of God—that is, the canonical scriptures contained in the books of the Old and New Testament—or by profane scoffing at or exposing them, or any of them, to contempt and ridicule; then any person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $200 or imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding twelve months, or both.

This would make, they were sure, a capital broom with which to do the Mrs. Partington act. They at once sent this virtuous "protest" to Mayor Fagan and Chief of Police Donovan:

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, are informed and believe that a crime is about to be committed by Col. Robert Ingersoll at the Hoboken theater on Sunday evening, Feb. 24, 1895, violating section 66 of the Crimes act. We beg that you will take immediate steps to prevent the violation of such law. We beg further to be informed at the earliest moment as to your disposition regarding this notice, that we may be relieved of further action in the matter.

Very respectfully,
H. T. BEATTY,
A. B. RICHARDSON,
W. R. JENVEY,
HERBERT CAMPBELL.

Fagan and Donovan held a consultation and decided that they could do nothing under the statute cited, as the ministers' complaint had to do with a contemplated offense only, not with one already committed. They knew just a little more about law than the preachers did, for they realized that it is not constitutionally possible to punish a man for fear that he will commit a crime, although the ministers have millions of precedents on their side, for a great many of our law manufacturers and judges know nothing about constitutions. But Messrs. Fagan and Donovan were anxious to accommodate the clerics if they could, and so concluded that the advertised lecture would be a violation of the Sunday law and a contravention of the terms of the theater's license, which, it was held, did not permit it to open as a public hall on Sunday. In accordance with this conception, Mayor Fagan instructed the chief to notify the manager of the theater that it must not be open on Sunday for any purpose. Manager Clark was naturally indignant, and, in company with the representative of Colonel Ingersoll, called on the mayor and endeavored to induce him to rescind his order. This he refused to do, but finally consented to abide by the opinion of Corporation Attorney Minturn. The public had on the afternoon of Saturday learned of the mayor's order, and the clergy rejoiced. Mr. Beatty said that it was only the beginning of a new era in Hoboken. Probably we shall never know, now that the affair has terminated so differently from the expectations of the parson, what he had in contemplation as the next step in the Puritan program; perhaps he intended to get an ordinance compelling every inhabitant of the town to attend religious services twice on Sunday. Be that as it may, the aspect of matters was very much changed by the following opinion submitted in writing by Mr. Minturn to the chief of police:

HOBOKEN, N. J., Feb. 23, 1895.

Charles A. Donovan, Esq.

DEAR SIR: There is nothing in the law that will prevent Colonel Ingersoll from lecturing here on any subject he may choose on Sunday, Feb. 24. Section 66 of the Crimes act makes him amenable to punishment if he violates its provisions, but as officials we have no legal right to anticipate that any citizen billed to lecture intends to violate that or any other law. We can only say after the deed is done that he has or has not violated the law; any other course would result in abolishing all the constitutional provisions guaranteeing freedom of speech, notably section 4 of the constitution of this state, as follows: "Every person may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right. No law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press."

I would advise you, therefore, that you cannot prevent Colonel Ingersoll from lecturing on Sunday or any other day. Very truly yours,
JAMES F. MINTURN,
Corporation Attorney.

Warned by this opinion, the chief of police did not issue any orders to the department, but detectives were detailed to attend the lecture and report if there was anything said that could be construed into a violation of the ancient blue law. The animus of the attack on Colonel Ingersoll was perfectly apparent when it was remembered that almost every Sunday night balls were held in some of the halls of the town without interference by the police.

The result of the free advertising by the ministers was that the theater was crowded to the doors with an enthusiastic audience. Detectives Nelson and Gallagher were there to arrest the Colonel on the spot if he "blasphemed"—that is, that was the promise made by Chief Donovan to the preachers. Some of the latter were present, including Rev. Mr. Beatty, and before the witty Freethinker was done with them even they had to laugh at his skillful exhortations of their pious but imprudent selves. It was at once evident that Colonel Ingersoll was choosing his own ground for fighting, and considered it no part of his duty to deliver himself into his enemies' hands. It is good military strategy to inflict as much damage as possible on the adversary without unduly exposing your own men to slaughter, and the Colonel is an excellent strategist. What he said against the Bible he said on the authority of eminent critics and skeptics who were not at that moment within the jurisdiction of the province of New Jersey. His own deductions were prefaced by such remarks as, "This is what Infidels say, and I am simply repeating it to you"; "I would really believe this if the statute of the state would permit"; "the wicked say," and "mind you, I am not giving my opinion."

We subjoin the Herald's report of the lecture, quoting such portions as were called out by the impotent performance of the ministers of God. After Colonel Ingersoll had spoken for about five minutes he walked away from the desk on which his notes lay, and said:

"The life of every human being is lighted by a little flame which is called reason. I have one, not very large or intense, and before the breeze of prejudice it may flicker and wane, and if it were blown out there would be orthodox darkness. It is the only light I have, and I am going to follow it as long as I live, and to-night we will let the little flames burn, not trying to extinguish them with the water of fear, but to feed them with the fuel of courage."

"In the state of New Jersey more than one hundred years ago, when the people were pious savages, there was enacted a law that allowed of no discussion of some questions—on one side. Since that time the people have become civilized to that degree that they want fair play, and have adopted other laws, which are not like the savage, absurd, malicious, and idiotic statute to which I refer."

"That statute sleeps in its grave until it is invoked by some bigots, some narrow-minded gentlemen who should have lived and died three hundred years ago—whose heads are of that shape," [and the Colonel made a peculiar motion with his hand] "and who really are not accountable."

"Some of these good men have so little confidence in their God that they feel he ought to be protected from ridicule. They feel their infinitesimal God cannot write a book that does not need protection. It has never occurred to any one that the works of Shakespeare, Shelley, Burns, and other great writers should have any assistance that it is in the power of legislators to give. One can hardly imagine that the infinitesimal should be under such deep obligations to the legislature of the state."

"Why are these men fearful of me? Is it because the arguments I use are sound; is it because they cannot be answered? If these men had intelligence to answer me I would be satisfied. But if you took all the men in the United States and put their brains in one skull, the owner of that skull would no more answer me than can the average Hoboken parson. Liberty is better than slavery."

Can they answer that? Progress is better than retrogression. Can they answer that?

"Every one who reads the Bible should be honest and intelligent enough to give an opinion of it, just as if the book were the Koran. Why should we not give an opinion of the Bible? A minister once told me that even if I did not believe in the Bible, I should not say so. When I asked him if he believed it, he said he did. Then I told him that by applying his own theory to himself, I could not say whether he believed it or not, for if he did not he could not admit it."

"Now to night I will tell you what educated theologians have to say about the Bible, and what learned heretics have to say. It would not be becoming in me to tell you, contrary to an act of the legislature, what I think, but I will tell you what others think, and I believe there is no law that can prevent you from making up your own minds, that is, if you do it in secret."

"I'm telling you what the wicked say, the men that have that hellish independence which will not allow themselves to be led by country parsons, who have such awful conceits that they can follow the light of their reason."

"I have met five or six men in this world who declared they were inspired, and every one of them was crazy. They were that kind of men who told you there is a God, and who wouldn't know God if they met him."

"Some clergymen are intelligent and educated. I don't refer to the clergymen of Hoboken, but there are some such. Most of them are not; they have a very narrow horizon and are not at all broad. Most of them feel that they are called to the ministry because they have not the constitution to be wicked. They go to a sectarian college, which is the storm center of ignorance, and, after they are graduated, they are like the lands along a part of the Potomac, as described by a writer, 'Almost worthless by nature, and rendered entirely so by cultivation.'"

"And yet I've been a friend of these men. I have been educating their congregations to that point where they turn to the ministers and cry, 'For God's sake, tell us what you think; don't wear the collar of ignorance, but do speak the truth.' Yes, I'm a friend of these ministers, for they love their enemies and they don't love me."

The Colonel then went into his lecture proper, interlarding his remarks with references to the discussion of the law. At one time he said:

"I'm not foolish enough to fight a statute passed by the combined intelligence of probably one hundred and fifty men. No books are inspired, to my mind, but still, if the legislature of New Jersey says they are, why, that ends it. Since that statute was passed, educated theologians have said that the Bible was not inspired. They could say that where they lived, because they thought it, but had they lived in Jersey they would have said the exact opposite. If it were not for that statute I might be inclined to agree with them, as it seems entirely reasonable, but as it is I am forced to disagree. For, mind you, I am not giving my opinion. I am just repeating what other people say."

"Just think what gluttons these parsons are in the way of revenge. They know I'm going to the penitentiary of God, where I'll be roasted and broiled for millions and millions of years; but these sanctified swine are not satisfied with that; they want me to be in the penitentiary here. They ought to be satisfied with what is in store for me. Think of their joy as they lean over the balustrade, and looking down into the bottomless pit, they see me and pointing at me exclaim, 'Ha! I told you so!'"

"If there be a God I pray him to-night to write in the book of his remembrance and put it opposite my name that I did what little I could to rescue his reputation from the calumnies of the church and the slanders of the pulpit. At least, that's my opinion, in any other state than this."

Referring to some of the atrocities as related in the Bible, the Colonel said:

"There are persons here in Hoboken who think that sort of thing is right, and by that they can prove the mercy and goodness of their God. They would like to carry fagots to build a fire around him that dared to disagree with them, or dare to question or investigate. They are as cruel as ever, and never in the history of the world was there known to be mercy in the heart of a priest."

"Does it not strike you that it is too bad that the good, honest, loving man, who does no wrong, but who can't believe in this book, is doomed to eternal damnation?" continued the Colonel. "It is too bad, but you cannot excite the sympathy of a Hoboken pastor on such topics."

"The ministers of Hoboken should rely on their gospel, on their intellectual force, on their majesty and splendor of character, and not on brute force,

They should say they believe in the religion of forgiveness, of kindness, of gentleness, and that they will endeavor to reform the world through generosity and love.

"Oh, the hypocrisy of these men! And how poorly educated they are! Give me the good, brave man, who has the generosity to say 'I will give to all others every right I claim for myself.' For we must not think that all the wisdom of the world is in the grave."

Then the Colonel delivered his usual peroration, and was cheered as he left the stage.

What Do You Believe?

When a plant has a healthy growth it is likely to develop into a more refined product than its ancestors, and each successive generation is an improvement on its predecessors; but if that plant proves to be a hybrid, the more it grows the more corrupt and deteriorated it becomes, because the source of its nourishment has lost its vital force, and decay is the inevitable result. If the supply of food for the growth of the plant is infected the plant must receive corruption in its nourishment.

The religions of ancient Egypt, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, Greece, Rome, and the states of northern Europe are all of the past; they died of their own corruption, because the priests, like other parasites, infected the people, the source of their nourishment. The devotees who worshiped at their various shrines were robbed of their vitality, and all went into oblivion together.

We must make due allowance for the legendary character of ancient history, because it has been to a great degree drawn from a mass of traditional ignorance that in most cases precludes the possibility of anything like accurate chronology, to say nothing of a right knowledge of the incidents involved. Thus, according to Chambers's Encyclopedia, Xanthos of Lydia places Zoroaster about six hundred years before the Trojan war, which was 1185 B.C., placing the Persian philosopher 1785 B.C. Others place him five thousand years before the Trojan war—a difference of 4,400 years. In the Bible (2 Kings) we find discrepancies in dates concerning Hilkiah the high priest, who is said to be contemporary with the Jewish king of Judah and also with Ezra after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, which would make Hilkiah quite an old man when he and Ezra were recording the law. We can accept ancient history only as we find it, a mythical jumble, and state it at its worth; the more ancient the more uncertain it becomes.

Other religions, incorporated with that of Zoroaster, have caused a radical change since his time. The Brahmanical religion has been subjected to a similar process, the priesthood having become beggars, robbers, and assassins. The Thugs of India are Brahmans, or Brahmanical priests, and murder is part of their official duty. The Buddhist religion resembles the Brahmanic in some particulars. Both teach the doctrine that man's existence is one of misery, a curse rather than a blessing; "which notion, or rather feeling, is like transmigration—common to both." (See Chambers's Encyclopedia.)

The Buddhist religion requires the devout Buddhists to live in seclusion part of the time, in forests, with no shelter but the shade of a tree; and some of the time in monasteries, in poverty and rags, obtaining their food by begging, doing nothing to produce physical comforts for themselves or others, but making themselves professional mendicants. Buddhism teaches nothing relative to a life beyond this world, but inculcates the doctrine of the transmigration of souls into other persons or animals in harmony with the good or bad tendencies of the departed, and after a period which may last for millions of years the soul may enter Nirvana, which means no existence. This is being born again with a vengeance. Brahmanism teaches the doctrine of a God, with a priesthood of the most tyrannical order. The one teaches slavery; the other, annihilation. Very little is known of Zoroaster's teachings except through his followers, the Parsees, who figured long after his time and no doubt made important changes in them before the Zend-avesta, the Parsee scripture, was written.

The doctrine of the duality of gods advanced by the Iranian people and perhaps of Parsee origin, is somewhat as follows: Ahura-Mazda was the all-bountiful, all-wise living being, or spirit, the source of all that was good and lovely, beautiful and delightful. Ahrimanyus was the dark and gloomy intelligence that had from the first been Ahura-Mazda's enemy, bent on thwarting and vexing him. And with these fundamental notions concerning both beings, all the sacred books agreed. Ahura-Mazda was declared to be the creator of life, earthly and spiritual; he had made the celestial bodies, the earth, water, and trees, all good creatures and all good things. He was the essence and the father of truth, the best being of all, the master of purity. Supremely happy, he possessed every blessing—health, wealth, virtue, wisdom, immortality. On the pious and the righteous he bestowed not only earthly advantages but precious spiritual gifts—devotion, the upright mind, and everlasting happiness.

Ahrimanyus, on the other hand, was the creator and upholder of everything that was evil. Opposed to Ahura-Mazda from the beginning, he had been engaged in a perpetual warfare with him. Whatever good thing Ahura-Mazda had created Ahrimanyus had corrupted and ruined. Moral and physical evils were alike at his disposal. He could blast the earth with barrenness, or make it produce thorns, thistles, and poisonous plants; his were the earthquake, the storm, the plague of hail, the thunderbolt; he could cause disease and death, sweep off a nation's herds and flocks by murrain, or depopulate a continent by pestilence; ferocious wild beasts, serpents, toads, mice, hornets, musketoes, were his creation; he invented and introduced into the world the sins of witchcraft, murder, unbelief, cannibalism; he incited wars and tumults, continually stirred up the bad against the good, and labored by every possible expedient to make vice triumph over virtue. (Rawlinson's Religions of the Ancient World.)

Here good and evil are taught to be separate entities, created by separate gods. No doubt they were believed to be special creations, the supposition not being entertained that evil was only the infringement of law, or a necessity attending a partially developed world.

The Romans believed in the existence of demons, but did not charge them with being evil continually, for their work was often good and noble. Homer calls the gods demons. Hesiod said that "there are in the air thirty thousand demons or ministering spirits, who were the souls of men in the golden age; but a proper classification of these is first found in the Pythagorean and Neo-Platonic systems." (See "Demons" in Chambers's Encyclopedia.)

The Lares, Manes, and Penates were tutelary spirits, genii, or deities of the Romans. The ancients had gods and goddesses of every conceivable degree, from their chief god to demons, nymphs, sprites, and others innumerable, giving the founder of a religion a large variety from which to choose.

I have taken pains to cite doctrines or matters of faith of various persons or nations from which might have been obtained the doctrines or creeds of the Jews and Christians, and wish now to state some historical facts that may have had a more positive influence in formulating the Christian faith than might at first sight be apparent. The gods and goddesses and their offspring, and the murdering of these gods and their sons and daughters, afford a wide field for an active imagination. Vishnu presided over the realms of bliss, into which he received the redeemed souls, and his son Crishna assisted him by conducting thence all the departed souls possible. In thus securing souls they were outstripping Diabolus, who presided over hades, and he became angry and nailed Crishna to a cross, where he died before Vishnu knew about it; but Vishnu raised or restored Crishna to a higher life, where he was not only out of the power of Diabolus, but exerted more influence than before. So teaches mythology, and the following I propose to give on the authority of the authors named.

Certain liberal Jews became acquainted with the doctrine of the god Vishnu and his son Crishna, the savior, and with their ideas of a future state of existence. This was very offensive to the Jewish priesthood, because it came from the Gentile world and held that Deity cared for others besides Jews; and in their intolerant state of mind they would rather kill a Gentile than make such a concession. But some of the liberal Jews doubted the truth of Judaism, and the more they reasoned on the subject the more they were convinced that it was not God but the Jew that made Abraham's covenant and all the Jewish religion. It was not long before a Jew that denied the faith had to die. Such severity was not argument and did not convince; but they did not want to die, so they formed a secret combination into which none but congenial spirits could come, and there they held private councils, and cautiously propagated their doctrines and increased in numbers. This secret order is known as the Essenes. Chambers's Encyclopedia defines them as follows: "Essenes, a small religious fraternity among the Jews, whose name and origin as well as character and history are alike involved in obscurity. Christianity stands in so close connection with them that John the Baptist and Christ himself have been pronounced to have originally issued from their ranks. More surprising than all, out of Essenism in the stage of Sabeanism has sprung Islam itself, and in this development of its tenets and practices are still preserved some of its principal rites."

Here we see the origin of John the Baptist and Jesus to have been similar to that of other men—no particular mystery about it; but they belonged to a secret organization at enmity with the Jews and liable to their cruel persecution; but we will quote from Peter Eckler in his notes to Edward Gibbon's "History of Christianity," pp. 125-7: "Robert Taylor, in his 'Diegesis,' says: 'Essenes, Therapeuts, Ascetics, Monks, Ecclesiastics, and Eclectics are but different names for one and the selfsame sect. Alexandria was the cradle of Christianity, and the Gnosis or Gnosticism comprehends the doctrines of the Magi, the philosophy of the Persians, Chaldeans, and Arabians and the wisdom of the Indians and Egyptians. It is distinctly to be traced in the text and doctrines of the New Testament.'" We cannot give space for further quotations, but the idea appears to be that the Essenes held baptism, prayer, and the holy repast as observances of worship, and were opposed to bloody sacrifice. They taught the system of healing the sick by the laying on of hands. Jesus and John the Baptist were initiates in the order of the Essenes, and it would appear from passages in the New Testament that mysteries were taught and secrecy enjoined by Jesus, who spoke in parables that they who were not initiated into the mysteries might not learn the secrets of the order. Matthew (xiii, 13) says: "Therefore speak I to them in parables; because they see and see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand." The Sermon on the Mount contains much Essenic doctrine, such as common use of property; take no thought for the morrow; ask and it shall be given; this generation shall not pass until all these things are fulfilled, etc., so we will conclude that John the Baptist and Jesus and his apostles taught Essenic doctrine and that they were persecuted and put to death by the Jews for such teaching. They embraced the doctrine of Vishnu and his son Crishna the savior, or the idea that Crishna was a divine sacrifice for the redemption of mankind from the curse of some deity, which curse was a common idea among ancient nations who embraced the whim of a future life, which the Jews never taught and which therefore was attractive to the disaffected Jews. This common idea of the curse of mankind made Crishna quite popular; it spread to Palestine and from there to Rome through the Roman conquests of Palestine and prisoners of war carried to Rome. In time Rome found paganism honeycombed with the new religion that had been propagated by Jesus and his followers; and Jesus, having been put to death for his religion, was looked upon as a martyr, and was by the Romans deified and called the Crishna or the Christ. The Romans were so prone to have a multiplicity of gods that the addition of one more did not provoke the resistance that would have been encountered in most nations. The perverted Essene doctrine, or the belief in Crishna blended with paganism and taught by the severely austere Romans, soon produced a priesthood that formulated doctrines and creeds in favor of the Christ Jesus. This new religion spread with the Roman conquests over the most of Europe, carrying with it both the Old Testament and the New, which the priests were changing and remodeling for more than a thousand years. (See History of the Bible in Chambers's Encyclopedia.)

The idea of dual gods, or good and evil, is at the bottom of all priesthoods; from it proceeds the idea of devil, hell, eternal punishment, and all the incidents of tithes, salaries, and the enslaving of minds for priestly gain. Make a false proposition, build them a mighty superstructure of falsehoods, and make it plausible, and the people are enslaved. The creation theory, that something can exist and support existence where nothing existed before—that something can be created from nothing, that effect comes without cause—a doctrine false, unreasonable, and unphilosophical—has also been at the foundation of all religions. Deprive the priests or clergy of a god, a devil, and a creation, and their services are no longer needed, because the people can do their own thinking.

There never was a more beautiful philosophy than evolution, or the development of all nature to more advanced or harmonious conditions, and I hope to see reformers more generally advocating it. On this depends the liberation of mankind from their servitude to priests and monarchs.

News and Notes.

Trinidad has been a glorious place for Free-thought lectures. I have given ten on a stretch to crowded houses, and it is evident that the best people of this community are on our side. Two revivals have been running since I was here, but they have not diminished in the least our audiences. Every night there was an increase, until hundreds had to be turned away. The lectures were given in the Jaffa Opera House, the largest hall in the city. There has been a lively agitation going on, and the contact of forces has been quite refreshing. The old bones of orthodoxy have rattled indeed. Before I came the ministers of the city voted a "conspiracy of silence." They would keep their mouths shut, hoping that in this way the Infidel would create no excitement. This was their forlorn hope. But they have been grievously disappointed. The flood-tide has been so great that they have had to talk. The talk, however, came too late, and could not stem the torrent. It was apparent that the Freethinker was of the majority party, although the boycott of orthodoxy was enforced and many were still afraid of their colors. A vast amount of Liberalism has been developed notwithstanding all opposition. Only a few began the campaign here and it was not expected that such great results would be achieved. Some thought if we had fifty or a hundred at each lecture it would be about all that we could expect, but I had one hundred and fifty at the first lecture and after that four hundred on an average. On Sunday the house could not begin to hold those who wished to attend.

The interest culminated in a debate between myself and the Jewish rabbi. Not an orthodox clergyman could be found to take up the gauntlet, and so the rabbi thought he would join in a friendly tilt. The questions discussed were as follows: Sunday afternoon: Resolved, That the Bible is the only moral authority for man. The rabbi took the affirmative, and myself the negative. Sunday evening: Resolved, That Science is the only moral and intellectual guide for man. I supported the affirmative, and the rabbi the negative. The rabbi is a very genial and accomplished gentleman. He maintained his side of the question with eloquence and fervor. He did not deal in slander or vituperation. He was earnest in manner and conviction, but with a Liberal spirit. He defended the Bible as best he could against the attacks of modern science, but I think of course that modern science carried the day victoriously. I argued that the only supreme authority for any individual was his own reason, and that in relation to this authority the Bible could only be an influence or confirmation. If, furthermore, we admitted the authority of nature, or of nature's God, still, as Thomas Paine affirms, that authority or revelation must be universal and permanent. It cannot be confined to the lids of any book. The Bible might contain some truth; and so far as truth is authority it might contain authority, but the authority is not the authority of the book, but of the truth it more or less expresses. So, therefore, I maintained as an unanswerable refutation of the position of the rabbi that the Bible could not be the only moral authority for man. It could only be one out of the many, even if the existence of a God is admitted. The Bible admits the "light of nature," and that light, so far as it illuminates, must be a moral authority outside of the Bible. Of course, I pointed out the defects and contradictions of the Bible; that it was against itself; that it sanctioned vice and crime, and that we were constantly compelled to sift and analyze and use our own reason as the judge of the Bible, and hence reason is the authority to which the Bible must be submitted.

In my affirmation in the evening's discussion, I defined science as the total classified knowledge of the human race, and therefore the only knowledge and guide that we could possibly have on any subject whatsoever. Therefore it is our only moral guide. Morality is an effort for human happiness. It arises entirely from our relations to one another, and has nothing at all to do with the existence of a God. The purpose of morality is to remove evil. To remove evil we must know its origin. In my argument I used the statement of Judge Wallace as to the origin of evil, which I think is sufficiently comprehensive. There are three causes of evil to man; namely, ignorance, selfishness, and the forces of nature. I cannot conceive of any other causes. Now, evidently, the only way to deal with these causes is by science. Science only can remove ignorance; science only can enlighten selfishness and combine it with altruistic feeling and effort; and science only can combine the forces of nature so as to avoid injury and use them as a benefit. These are the main points, but the discussion occupied five hours in all, and there were many plays and interplays of thought and argument, over the wide field of combat, which I cannot record. But I never enjoyed a debate better than this; I had a first rate opponent; there was a great and thoroughly attentive audience of men and women who represented the intelligence and influence of the community, and the subjects discussed were of a deeply interesting nature and embraced the noblest realms of human inquiry. I am sure that this debate will have a vast influence in the progress of Freethought in this place. It has profoundly agitated, and the currents of new ideas will not cease to flow.

I have found an agreeable variety of fellowship in this city, which is a typical western town with manifold elements of growth. Edwin B. Franks, who introduced me at the first lecture and presided at the debate Sunday afternoon, is one of the brilliant orators of the West, and devoted to reform in a radical and comprehensive spirit. He has already made his mark. He is a writer of exceptional ability. He is a realistic Western story-teller, and his tales published in the Great Divide, and elsewhere, are picturesque and powerful delineations of border life, its pathos, tragedy, and strange commingling of virtue and crime. He produces from his own experience, having had varied fortunes along this vast frontier. He has a career before him of splendid promise. His inspirations are nature and humanity.

In the brain of John L. Schuyler originated the first thought of this great campaign at Trinidad. He has always been an outspoken Freethinker, and is well known for his radical views. More than a year ago he determined to have some Freethought lectures in this community, and working slowly and surely he gradually brought about this present movement, which has surpassed his highest expectations. I visited him at his home at El Moro, about five miles from Trinidad. El Moro means "castle," and is named from a huge eminence which towers like a castle alongside the little straggling village. I met Mrs. Schuyler and the two children and Mr. Schuyler's mother, and spent a pleasant holiday, February 22d. It was a good time to remember Washington. Mrs. Schuyler is somewhat of a Christian professor, but being the daughter of Mrs. C. A. Berleth she must have a broad and liberal outlook, and the dogmas of the church melt in the sunshine of a real humanity. She was not afraid to attend the lectures, although her Christian friends warned her that she was going to the devil in doing so. Mr. Schuyler found an able supporter in Mr. Alex. McDonald, who is an old-time Freethinker from Pennsylvania. He was one of the three arrested at Irwin's Station, Pa., twenty years ago for blasphemy, and put under bonds. He has always been an unflinching advocate of our cause. He is a coal miner, and has worked in the ranks of labor for freedom and justice. He made a short address at the opening of the debate on Sunday evening which met with warm approval. The flag of Freethought will never be hauled down while McDonald is on the path. Being born in Scotland, he has the fire and vim of Burns himself. He is a great student of the poet, and can repeat almost all his poetry from memory; and has many a poetic dart to penetrate the armor of orthodoxy.

Dr. Charlton gave me a delightful drive about Trinidad. The weather has been gorgeous since I came, and the hills and plains are covered with a flood of beautiful light. The sceneries about Trinidad in the lustrous atmosphere are attractive. Great bluffs shoot up hundreds and thousands of feet. As we pursued our route to Sopris, a mining town up the valley, the snowy range appeared before our gaze in its vast and wonderful glory. It was indeed a dazzling picture. The whole horizon was crowded with shining peaks in every variety of lofty form and glittering splendor. Mountain rose on mountain in white effulgence until it seemed as if they flung their giant crests against the very heavens themselves, and would fill the depths of the sky with their gleaming treasures. Over the brow of neighboring hills could be seen the Spanish peaks, with mingling white and blue, the blue predominant in contrast with the more stupendous masses of the snowy range. In the clear, brilliant atmosphere, the shining sky, with spring's loveliness overhead, the outspread panorama was indeed a glorious enchantment. There is no place in the world that can boast of a finer climate the year round than Trinidad.

W. R. Scurlock on another day took me over to the coke ovens near El Moro. The coke ovens present a lurid and magnificent appearance by night as you sweep by them on the cars. It is as if the gates of hell were open and the flames were rushing forth. A nearer look into their heated depths does not diminish the fiery spectacle. I do not believe that anybody could stand these flames, not even the Scripture worthies with asbestos overcoats. They would be singed, sure, and the devil could claim his own. There are two hundred and fifty ovens at this place, and all the sinners in Trinidad could be roasted to their heart's content. I doubt if all the prayers of the priest could save a man if he once tumbled in. Not even a skeleton would be left. I didn't see the devil and his fork, but I imagine he could do a thriving business with this outfit.

Mr. Scurlock is a vigorous Freethinker, and it runs in his blood. I met his brother out West at Spokane, and he is a rattling good campaigner. We joined forces for a while and made things lively on the frontier. It was a pleasure to meet his brother soldier in Colorado. Mayor August Krille is one of the popular men of Trinidad, a gentleman and a scholar, and courteous to the stranger within his gates. He introduced me to the Trinidad Club. This is a fine organization. It has elegant rooms and gives a warm welcome to the Secular Pilgrim without respect to creed. The social life of Trinidad is of excellent quality and hospitable to the wayfarer. Philosophy and art prevail with the amenities of life. The knights of the Round Table might gather here and enjoy the cream of modern civilization. I have found Rabbi Freudenthal and the Jews of this place a very generous and progressive element. Retaining the chief portions of their ancient faith, they are willing to take in the new with the unquenchable spirit of their race. They represent much of the business and wealth of Trinidad. John Gysin is one of our staunch friends here, as firm as the mountains of his own native Switzerland. He breathed the air of liberty with his birth. He painted the town—I shall not say red, but with brilliant colors—for the welcome of the Freethought pioneer. I never had such a glorious advertisement in my life. Gysin is a true artist, and he made Freethought shine in noble form and color, with hues as brilliant as those which hover in the sunrise glory of Mt. Blanc itself.

I was pleased to meet Wilbur Thomas, the representative of the Rocky Mountain News, an all-round newspaper man and a philosopher to boot. He goes into the depths of things, and from the center sees the whole circumference.

Judge S. S. Wallace presided on Sunday evening. Recognizing that ignorance, selfishness, and the forces of nature are the power of all evil, he has no use for theology or the fall of man. He remarked that while man is the smartest animal on the planet he is also the biggest fool. No doubt of it, for I do not know of any other animal who is a theologian. Judge Wallace is always ready to stand by his convictions. E. T. Squires has traveled the road to Freethought from Rome to reason. He is one of the best posted men in the city. B. F. Springer is always ready to lend a hand, and never goes back on a friend. A. E. Straub puts his shoulder to the wheel through thick and thin, and T. M. Murray can perform the work of a Hercules if necessary. Chris Taylor, the stage manager of Jaffa Opera House, where the lectures are given, always helps the church for humanity's sake, but has no use for what my friend Franks terms the evangelistic jumping-jack, who has no other occupation than to slander people. Eugene Robinson, of the Paul Kauvar Company, knows by experience that in the drama of life the supernatural is only a ghost. Henry Schneider can minister to good health with nectar clear as crystal. George H. Bain, although blind, has the soul of music. With George Greenfield, he furnished delightful melodies for our marching columns.

I cannot mention all whom I have met in a social way who, whether or not on my line of thought, have treated me with the liberality and courtesy of true gentlemen. The Messrs. Jaffa, proprietors of the Opera House; the Mansbach brothers, who mingle the treasures of the olden time with the splendors of the new; Patrick Henry Murry, worthy of his glorious namesake; Messrs. Schulze, Gordon, John Webber, John Bitzer, and Hugo Borath on TRUTH SEEKER roll; Branaugh and Kellerman, P. W. Cook, James Craig, Dr. R. A. Greenfield, Dr. J. B. Hershey, Theodore Smith, Geo. D. Williamson, J. R. Maulding, Fred. C. Eymann, H. W. Krug, and about fifty others. F. D. Goodale and Al. Stone are progressive representatives of the press in Trinidad. The Chronicle is the leading paper of this section. It is newsy and gets in the best things, among which are appreciative notices of the Freethought lecture. The proprietors of this paper are willing to tell people what is going on and to publish all sides. They are impartial, and everything worthy of note has a fair show. There is a host of Liberal men and women here, and there is a grand opening for permanent Freethought work. Over one hundred names are on the Federation list. A local organization will be formed for literary, scientific, humanitarian, and social progress, on the basis of universal mental emancipation. There was a large attendance of ladies at the lectures. A beautiful bouquet was presented on Monday evening at the closing lecture, so the path of Freethought is not always hard and rough. Music and flowers give hope and courage.

One of the revivalists here was the aforesaid "evangelistic jumping-jack." He has now departed. He is one of that kind who can always leave his country for his country's good. He has simply slandered and insulted the people of this place. This is the only way he has of creating a sensation. He longs for martyrdom, and would like to be horsewhipped in order to pose as a victim for the Lord's sake. To illustrate the spirit of these revivals I will give a specimen of "Christian charity." Dr. Hershey had a lady patient near the church building, and the ringing of the bell was injurious to her prostrated nervous system. A request was made to stop the ringing of the bell for the time being. This was refused. The bell rings on, the sick one suffers, and the callous congregation sing praises to the Lord. The pastor declared that when he was himself sick, the sound of the church bell was medicin to his soul. Like St. Paul he lied for the glory of God. He was a saint; the lady was a "sinner," and he had no mercy in his heart. He would crush and kill with the ding-dong of his murderous bell.

Trinidad is one of the brightest cities in the West. It is called the picturesque queen of the mountains. It is the coal and coke depository of the West. There are about eight hundred square miles of coal deposits in this country. It can supply all the great West. The price of coal is from $1.15 to $2 a ton. An immense business will eventually be built up here. A mountain stream flows through the heart of the city. It is called "Purgatory," but it conveys no such impression. The legend is that souls were lost in the river, and hence its name. The Indians corrupt the name into "Picket Wire." On the north is a lofty light, Simpson's Rest, inclosing the remains of the pioneer who gave it its name, over whose dust the monument points to the skies. On the South is Fisher's or Raton Peak, ten thousand feet above the sea. From these towering crests vast and wonderful scenes stretch away for hundreds of miles—mountains and prairies glimmering in endless glory.

Trinidad is on the old emigrant route from the states. It is the county seat of Las Animas county. It has a population of about ten thousand. There are about two thousand employees of the mines. The mountains and plains meet here in commercial intercourse. The miner, the farmer, the lumberman, the quarryman, are all here. Trinidad has no rival within ninety miles. It is called the Gate City. In every respect Trinidad occupies a fortunate position. From the bowels of the earth to the bright blue skies above wealth gleams and flows for the benefit of man. And mingling with the beauty of earth and its mighty riches are the arts, the refinements, the splendor of liberty, and the blaze of reason and science. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Trinidad, Feb. 26, 1895.

Observations.

The editor of the Voice (pious and prohibition) is burning bridges behind him in a way that I call reckless. He says, in effect, that any Christian who believes that the wine manufactured by Christ at Cana of Galilee was alcoholic is a believer in intemperate drinking, and he quotes scripture in proof. Here it is: The account (John ii, 10) tells us that the governor of the feast, after tasting the wine made by Christ, remarked to the bridegroom: "Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse; but thou hast kept the good wine until now."

Dr. Funk, editor of the Voice, goes on to say: "That is, the guests had already 'well drunk' when this new instalment of wine was furnished them by Christ. Therefore, if the wine was alcoholic, Christ was encouraging not moderate drinking but intemperance." How, inquires Dr. Funk, does any preacher holding to the alcoholic quality of the wine, dare to oppose intemperance and repudiate the Master?

The most hopeless case I know of is that of the gospel-temperance enthusiasts, whose cause rests on the contention that the Cana wine was not alcoholic. They could just as convincingly argue that the loaves and fishes on which the multitude were fed contained no substance; that the calming of the storm by Jesus was unattended by a subsidence of the waves; that the money found in the mouth of the fish had no intrinsic value, and that the life restored to Lazarus was devoid of animation. It would be as easy to make a crowd accept wind-pudding for bread and fish; to convince a sailor that a storm is over when it isn't; to pass countefeit money on a tax collector, or to make people believe that a man reported dead is still living, as to shove wine with no fuddle on it on a liquor-drinking company. The wine was either alcoholic or fraudulent, and Christ, while not giving the guests a stone when they asked for bread, indubitably treated them to physic when they called for a stimulant. If the governor of the feast was sober enough to note that the drinks had been changed on the company, he would have seen that this fresh supply was "soft," and, in consideration of the fact that some of the guests were getting full, he would have indorsed the bridegroom's foresight with the remark that it was time for them to begin tapering off. As between the making of a good article of claret and the dosing a miscellaneous assemblage with stuff that would create a pain under every apron and belt, I should approve the former, even though a prohibitionist; and if the act were condemned as a bad example, I would give everybody permission to have all the wine they could manufacture from water.

Dr. Funk is said to be temperate in his drinking, but in his writing he is quite the reverse; for to abstain from drunkenness, although Christ appears to have encouraged it, is not a repudiation of him any more than it is a repudiation of him to refrain from saying to our mothers, as Christ says to his in the same chapter, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" The uninspired truth seems to be that the Master was there to enjoy himself and did not care to have the old lady interfere with his amusement; also, that the wine which he raised on the convivial party was not intended for medicinal or sacramental purposes.

"It is not well," observes the New York Independent, "to pay any attention to such a man as Mr. Ingersoll." The outcome of the attentions which the clerical hobos of Hoboken paid to the Colonel recently confirms the Independent's hypothesis so far as hostile parson's are concerned; but why, in the name of mercy to dumb brutes, was not the warning uttered previously? After those Hoboken ministers had diverted the notice of Colonel Ingersoll from Jehovah to themselves—and were at once made to mourn that they had done so—the Independent's fling is like sand in their teeth. Sitting there in the Hoboken theater, with the speaker of the evening peeling their bark until they experienced in the souls of them all the agonies of faying described in Fox's "Book of Martyrs," those clergymen could have recalled the orthodox editor's admonition, not only as words of wisdom, but as the language of actual prophecy and inspiration. But what does it profit them now to say that "it is not well to pay any attention to such a man as Mr. Ingersoll?" The ministers of Hoboken found that out working independently; and they are not at all well themselves.

With reference to Colonel Ingersoll's remark that some Christians are such gluttons for punishment that besides consigning the wicked to eternal perdition after death, they would send them to jail in this world, I want to say that all believers are not so. My wife's grandmother, who was a Christian if everlasting preaching and praying can make one, was an example—at least during her married life. Being "unequally yoked" with an unbeliever, she was asked by her fellow-Christians how she could render wifely obedience and benevolence to such a man. She replied that she was thus complaisant towards him for the reason that she knew all the joy he ever got would be obtained in this world, and that any discomfort she could subject her husband to would not be a priming to the trouble God would make for him in the next. So she bore up under affliction with a resignation strengthened by that beautiful thought. When he kicked she did not hit him with the poker. Instead, she stirred the fire and thought how God's branding-iron was warming for John. And she would have gone to heaven and been justified except for one thing, and that was that John repented before his death and went there ahead of her, leaving her to twenty years of widowhood, during which she was never quite satisfied in her mind that she had done a Christian's duty. It never occurred to her that there was a flaw in the system of religion which permits offenders to escape punishment here, and by repenting to avoid the terrors of the hereafter. If anybody was to blame she felt sure that it was herself, and I am not certain that she never asked God's pardon for not taking it out of John while she had him. It is historically probable that an occasional thumping would have done him good.

John McGlashan, who has just died in Ukiah, Mendocino county, California, was a man worth knowing. He was a rationalist in all things. Some of us are good judges of human nature in general;

John McGlashan was not only this, but a good judge of himself, and he would admit a mistake in conduct or an error in judgment with a candor that I never saw equaled by anybody else. He was so systematic that I think he had about all the affairs of life classified and labeled, and he was so fair that if convinced that any of them were marked wrong, he would not go to bed at night until he changed the label. He was open-minded, and you could get to his understanding without having to climb over walls of prejudice, and without being kicked away from the door half a dozen times before you got in. He rejected nothing as totally worthless so long as a reasonable plea could be made for its acceptance; and, furthermore, he took nothing on faith. This mental state made him a Freethinker and an unbeliever in the Christian religion. Approach him with any proposition, religious, political or economic, and he would ask, "By what argument or proof do you support your assertion?" Then he would patiently listen. If your argument was conclusiv, you gained a convert; but you couldn't humbug him. He was so careful in this matter that he would not even laugh at a joke until he had conned it, weighed it, gone over it forward and backward, and tested its point. Then, if the pleasantry was found to be genuine, his countenance would be illuminated like the globe of an electric light when the current is turned on. He was even more slow to anger, so that when his wrath was once aroused it was likely to be righteous.

Biographically speaking, Mr. McGlashan was born in Scotland. He came to America when a boy, and learned the type foundry's trade—I think at the elder Bruce's. He embarked later in the book and news business, always making money. Later still he went to Australia and raised sheep, becoming forehanded. He returned to San Francisco, and, as I have been informed, established the book concern which has grown into the Bancroft Company, the largest dealers on the Pacific coast. Then he bought a ranch in Mendocino county, near the railway station now called Largo, where resides the Mr. Long who officiated at his funeral. The ranch is to-day valued at upwards of $30,000, for John was systematic, industrious, and thrifty. His handiwork is traced in the improvements of the country for miles around. When he got old enough and wealthy enough to quit manual labor, he removed to Ukiah, where he erected a house and laid out grounds the most attractive in the city. He also built a large business block. He became a widower in 1887. I first made his acquaintance when he came to San Francisco to purchase a family monument, which he designed should perpetuate not only his name but his principles. He spent a day or two looking through Freethought books for the proper inscriptions. Together we drew up a plan of the monument, which in 1891 I found standing in all its lofty beauty in the cemetery at Ukiah, the front bearing these words:

Whoever is afraid of submitting any question to the test of free discussion is more in love with his own opinion than with truth.

Other sentiments expressed are:

Credulity is not a virtue. Investigation is not a crime. Truth is a blessing to which all men have an equal right by the laws of nature.

Reason was given man to be exercised, not stifled. Reason must be our guide and judge in everything.

Some of the religious people of Ukiah objected to such a monument in a Christian cemetery, but John was not deterred. His mind was made up, and if it had been necessary to put the shaft in a cannon and fire it into the burial grounds, I do not believe he would have hesitated to take such a method before consenting to a change of design or the erasing of a letter.

In 1889, when he was upwards of seventy years of age, he remarried, his estimable wife being the daily journalist of Ukiah. I had the privilege of acting as best man at the wedding, and a year or two later he recognized my services by placing his infant daughter Jeanie on my knee.

But good John McGlashan sleeps upon his pillow of dust. He regarded the notion of a future life as altogether "inconsistent," and for him religion offered no consolation; but he so lived that his memory is a dear possession of all worthy to be his friends. He had the courage while living to inscribe his sentiments where for centuries they may be read by all who seek his grave; and I do not need to have been by his deathbed to witness to the philosophical calmness, the stern pride, and even the grim pleasure with which he relinquished his place among the living to find a couch beneath that monument through which, though dead, he might still speak his mind to the world. Education Givs Hope.

MARCELINE, MO., Feb. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $5, which I cheerfully remit to you for books as per inclosed list. The basis of my hopes for the extinction of priestcraft are the progress of knowledge and the increased exercise of the reasoning faculties. Yours fraternally,

The Best Minds for the Best Minds.

KERNVILLE, CAL., Feb. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. S. P. Putnam deserves great credit. I have read the good book, "Four Hundred Years of Free-thought." It is the best book I have ever read. "Four Hundred Years of Free-thought" reflects the thoughts of the best of human minds and for the best of human mind.

G. C. JORGENSEN.

For the Flecken Contest.

WATERTOWN, MINN., Feb. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: You may put me down for $1 to help Mr. S. J. Flecken, of Kandiyohi, in his noble fight for a pure secular school. When called upon to remit this amount I shall do so with pleasure, and will double or treble it if possible, or as much as I can give.

Hoping that the orthodox meddlers will be completely routed, I remain,

Yours for justice,

JOHN P. THORNQUEST.

A Reminder.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Feb. 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please permit me to reply to J. S. Palmer's letter in your paper of February 2d. Is he not aware that Mrs. Slenker is already editing such a paper for the young as he mentions? And a worthy paper it is. The only complaint that can truthfully be made is its lack of support by Liberals themselves. Will he not subscribe for the "half dozen" copies—more if possible—and thus help the good cause along?

SADIE ATHENA MAGOON.

A Ponderous Missionary.

NEWARK, N. Y., Feb. 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I want to do a little missionary work for the cause of Freethought, which means justice, honor, morality, love, and mercy to all. Therefore you will find $6.50 for one year's subscription to your paper, and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I want this valuable book to lend around among my friends, as I have one myself. It is a great book when read understandingly.

Yours truly for the welfare of humanity,

WM. H. H. STEBBINS.

A Winter Plague.

SOMERVILLE, IND., Feb. 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1.50 to renew my subscription for six months. We have very few Freethinkers in my neighborhood, and those rarely express themselves. Revivals are the constant plague through the winter season. The ministers shoot old Satan with the gospel gun; then the superstitions of the people are thoroughly aroused. But in the near future may the light of Freethought rule and govern our people and reasoning shake off the shackles of the fear of eternal punishment and teach them to live for the advancement of humanity and liberty.

Liberal Enough to Borrow.

MECHANICSBURG, ILL., Feb. 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4.25 to be applied to renewed subscription and for books. I am getting old. I have lived out the allotted time, 70 years, and still want THE TRUTH SEEKER and as many books as I can find time to read. There are plenty of Freethinkers in this town and surrounding country, and they are becoming more numerous. Some of them speak out boldly, while some are backward. But one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER comes to this place, and I think it is read by more people than any other paper that is taken here. Yours in the good cause,

A. H. MARTIN.

Down With the Sabbath Laws.

HAMILTON, Feb., 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The two petitions to be presented to our legislature, asking it to do away with a law that is so objectionable to the people that it cannot be enforced, are in circulation for signatures. Be so good as to send me six more petitions that I may hand them to others to circulate for names.

Now we are in for one of our demands let us make as good a fight for it as our enemies will make a defense. They will think the more of us than if we allowed them to beat us as they so many times have done. When we are done with those contemptible laws and have gained one point, then we will try another. Taxation is the next fight, and in that we are pretty sure of success, for if we circulated petitions asking that all property belonging to saints and sinners pay the same rate of taxation, without exemption, enough would unite in so doing that we could get that for which we have so long contended. The signs of the time are encouraging, and if we are as active as our enemies we shall succeed.

I am well acquainted with our state senators and our member. I shall labor with them both in this matter.

Sincerely, your fellow laborer in this cause,

CARLTON RICE.

Official Stupidity.

CLINTON, IA., Feb. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Since I wrote you last I have got converted, and now I feel like telling you to believe or be damned to you. It is like this: On last Saturday the census man called. He asked me my name and where I was born, and I told him as nearly as I could. He asked, "What religion?" I told him I was just out of that article, and didn't have any. He says, "What church do you lean toward?" I said, "None." He says, "What do you call yourself?" I said, "I call myself a Freethinker, but many folks call me infidel." Then he asked my wife, and she said she didn't have any religion anymore. So I told him I thought the best thing he could do would be to put us down Nothingarians. He wrote something in his book. I didn't see what it was, but I have been told since that they put down every one as Protestant who says he is not Catholic. Now, that is how I became a Christian. It's a little rough to have them swell their numbers from among Freethinkers in that way, but, so far as I am concerned, I will see to it that the weekly collection will not suffer any by swelling. Oh, how it would please me to see every lazy bigot have to work and earn an honest living!

The Theocratic Leaders.

EDMONDS, WASH., Feb. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Will you give me the names of the most noted ministers who advocate "God-in-the-Constitution," and the church to which they belong? I know there was one noted Unitarian in the list, and I particularly want his name, as I made a statement in a lecture the other night that was challenged that I know is true, though the name has escaped me.

P. C. MILLS.

[Rev. A. D. Mayo, of the Unitarians, is probably the clergyman our correspondent had in mind, or possibly he may have been thinking of Rev. A. A. Miner, Universalist, of Tufts College, who was for years a vice-president of the National Reform Association (God-in-the-Constitution party), and is still warmly attached to its principles. A majority of the ministers who are engineering the theocratic movement are Presbyterians, largely of the Covenanter division, although there are prominent Methodists, Episcopalians, and others in the scheme, including at least one Quaker, Josiah Leeds, of Philadelphia. Rev. D. McAllister, Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, Rev. T. P. Stevenson, Rev. R. C. Wylie, Rev. H. H. George, Rev. J. M. Foster, are among the more active workers in the crusade, although there are others who are of more exalted rank in the churches. Ex-Judge Strong of the United States Supreme Court was one of its officers while he was on the bench, and ex-Gov. Robert E. Pattison is one of the many lay friends of the party.—Ed. T. S.]

Christians Celebrating Paine's Birthday.

ANDOVER, KAN., Feb. 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR AND FRIENDS OF THE TRUTH

SEEKER: I think it is the duty of all truly liberal minded people to speak out in meeting and let the world know what they think of the rotten creeds and sordid dogmas taught them by the sky pilots. The 29th day of January dawned and found the intelligent people of Andover and vicinity in high spirits over the coming celebration in honor of the birth of Thomas Paine, since it was the first to be held in or near the town. But all of this time the Christians were not asleep, as is their natural state. They circulated a great many lies as to what we were going to do. They had never heard of such a thing before. We had a hall spoken for and were intending to occupy the same when, not to our astonishment, we found that a preacher's better half had fooled us out of it by writing to the owner a letter telling him of the use to which it was to be put. The owner happened to be a preacher, so he immediately sent a reply, ordering the agent here not to let us have the hall for any consideration. Then we got the G. A. R. Hall. They also had a free supper in the M. E. church. In spite of free suppers and people with scales over their eyes we had a good audience. We joked them for celebrating Paine's birthday. They said it was not Paine's birth they were honoring, but the birth of the state of Kansas. They were beat at their own game, for, as every intelligent person knows, Kansas was made a state on the 29th of January by its truly honorable governor in honor of Paine's birthday.

Yours for truth and justice,

LOTTIE WOLFE.

A Liberal Engineer's Troubles.

CLEVELAND, O., Jan. 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 to pay for your grand paper till I get value received. I have read your paper for about six months, and after I read them I distribute them to Liberal friends. I would like to buy a great many of the Liberal books you advertise. I lately sent through a newsdealer for Heston's book, the "Old Testament Comically Illustrated," with which I have already liberated a few persons. I cannot, at present, send for Liberal books as I wish to; it is because I have been persecuted by Christians in a way that will be hard for you to believe. I send you clippings from papers that you may better understand my case.

I have been an engineer for about eight years. Last July an engineer left his place and put me in. He was a strict Christian, brought up in a small town. He later on heard that I was a Liberal, therefore he hated me. This year I tried to get my license renewed, and this man told the examiner what a bad man I was, so he went against me. He refused me a license. Then there was a committee appointed to examine me—Mr. Murphy, Mr. Welsh, Mr. O'Brien, all Catholics, although O'Brien is more Liberal than the others. He said to me: "You are to be examined by three Catholics." I said, "If they are just, that is all I ask." After examination O'Brien said to me that I would have had an easier time of it if I had been a Catholic.

I am a Freethinker, and always shall be, and am proud of it. This persecution has cost me one week's sickness and two months of trouble, and $23.88. Yes, I am loyal to our cause. I have now put the whole matter into a lawyer's hand, so it is not ended yet.

Sometimes I am almost discouraged, but I shall never give up. I realize that only through your paper can I get sympathy and friends. I am a friend to everyone, but not everyone is a friend to me.

At examination they asked me sixty-six questions. I missed one, and on account of that one they tried to down me. I am only twenty-four years old, and am a Liberal only a little over one year. An old engineer told me to read the Bible through and mark every verse that did not accord with love, morality, and justice. I did so, and have read the Bible through three times, and you ought to see it. I found and counted 1,725 foul verses—1,400 in the Old Testament, and 325 in the New Testament. God murdered and hated, at different times, 3,000—2,500 in the Old Testament, and 500 in the New Testament. Murders and wars 1,350—1,050 in the Old Testament, and 300 in the New Testament.

Truths and morals in the Old Testament 500; in the New Testament 300. In the whole Bible, 800.

Liberal men and women, I ask your friendship, sympathy, and advice. You are also welcome to write to me if you wish. I shall try to answer all your letters. Hoping to be able to always take your paper, I am, Yours very respectfully, FRED MORLOCK, 1586 E. Madison av.

Two Cruel Prayers.

STRASBURG, ILL., Feb. 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The following is an exact translation from the Arabic of the official prayer of Islam, which is used throughout Turkey and daily repeated in the Cairo "Azhar" University by 10,000 Mohammedan students from all lands:

"I seek refuge with Allah from Satan, the accursed. In the name of Allah, the Compassionate, the Merciful! O Lord of all Creatures! O Allah! Destroy the infidels and polytheists, thine enemies, the enemies of thy religion! O Allah! Make their children orphans, and defile their abodes, and cause their feet to slip, and give them, and their families, and their households, and their women, and their children, and their relatives by marriage, and their brothers, and their friends, and their possessions, and their race, and their wealth, and their lands, as booty to the Moslems, O Lord of all Creatures!"

"In all the other religions of even the semi-civilized nations of the globe," says the Philadelphia Record, commenting upon this, "there can be no prayer found to parallel this cruel appeal of Islam to the spirit of inhumanity. Bulgaria, Damascus, Lebanon, and Armenia may or may not be mere hotbeds of anti Turkish intrigue; with such a national prayer Turkey stands self-condemned before the world!"

We refer the Philadelphia Record to the 109th Psalm of the holy or unholy Bible to find its parallel or match, beginning with the 6th verse and reading to and including the 20th:

"Set thou a wicked man over him; and let Satan stand at his right hand. When he shall be judged let him be condemned: and let his prayer become sin. Let his days be few, and let another take his office. Let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow. Let his children be continually vagabonds, and beg; let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places. Let the extortioner catch all that he hath; and let the strangers spoil his labor. Let there be none to extend mercy unto him: neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children. Let his posterity be cut off; and in the generation following let their name be blotted out. Let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered with the Lord; and let not the sins of his mother be blotted out. Let them be before the Lord continually, that he may cut off the memory of them from the earth. Because that he remembered not to show mercy, but persecuted the poor and needy man, that he might even slay the broken in heart. As he loved cursing, so let it come unto him: as he delighted not in blessing, so let it be far from him. As he clothed himself with cursing like as with his garment, so let it come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones. Let it be unto him as the garment which covereth him, and for a girdle wherewith he is girded continually. Let this be the reward of mine adversaries from the Lord, and of them that speak evil against my soul."

Yours truly, H. BERNHARD.

Let's from Lecturers—A Suggestion.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I think there is nothing you publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER more interesting to the general reader than the letters from the lecturers in the lecture field. It was said in Theodore Parker's time that there was no preacher in America who had such general knowledge of everything as the noted antislavery preacher who filled Music Hall, Boston, every Sunday. And I heard a noted Boston lecturer account for the fact in this way: For many years Mr. Parker traveled the country as a public lecturer, speaking in nearly all the large and small towns throughout the country. He usually had a day or so to spend in nearly every place, and he made it a point to look up the most interesting institution in the town, the one that the people of the town most prided themselves upon, and then he would fully investigate it, and learn as much about it as it was possible to learn in so brief a period of time—then, after he came home, he was able to often make a good point or illustration from this knowledge in one of his sermons or lectures. This has suggested to me that by following that method our traveling Freethought preachers might make themselves still more valuable teachers to us readers, through THE TRUTH SEEKER and others of our weekly Freethought papers.

To more fully illustrate: Mr. Putnam spends a day somewhere in the far West, or as to that matter, in any town. He finds, by inquiry, that this town is the only place in the United States, or at least one of two or three places, where a certain article is manufactured—a thing in common use, it may be, but that but few understand how it is manufactured—out of what materials, by what methods, etc. If Mr. Putnam will go to the proprietors they will be more than glad to give him all the information he desires on this subject, as they will see at once it will be a good advertising scheme for them. Then Mr. Putnam will put it into his letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all the readers will get this valuable information. These letters would make THE TRUTH SEEKER an interesting paper for all who were dealing in that kind of goods, and also to many of the consumers.

This would be in the direct line of Freethought, for Freethought proposes to reform the world by educating the people. That is the only true method of reform. If I may be allowed to digress a little from the special subject of this letter, I will say that in my opinion the world can be reformed only by education—by real genuine knowledge. For instance: Everyone desires to be happy. Therefore, every person does those things and follows that course and those practices that he thinks will bring him the most enjoyment. If the inebriate could be educated so that he could see plainly that he could acquire more real happiness by remaining sober than by getting intoxicated he would remain sober. So with the thief. So with the miser. So with every other class. The trouble is, they are searching for happiness in the dark without the light of the lamp of education, and they therefore make great mistakes. If for the last eighteen hundred years we had been blest with educators in place of preachers, we might all have known by this time how to acquire real, genuine happiness. Therefore I have written this letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER for the purpose of urging it upon our traveling lecturers to become our instructors. I believe if they would make a specialty of this kind of work you would see hundreds of people in search of our Liberal journals who do not now care for them; for, thanks to Freethought, the people are beginning to learn that it is real scientific knowledge that they need, not superstition and fable. Characteristic Clerical Contortions.

NIPOMO, CAL., Jan. 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: If you will kindly give me space in your valuable paper I will tell your readers of the lively times a Freethought lecturer has been causing here, and of a characteristic attempt by a minister of the gospel to suppress the truth. There are many Freethinkers in and about Nipomo, though quite unorganized as yet. So when Mr. O. A. Phelps, of Colorado, came here and offered to give us a series of lectures at very reasonable terms, we gladly accepted. Ministers and all were cordially invited and Mr. Phelps opened the ball New Year's eve by a lecture on "What is Freethought?" This was followed by "The Fall of Man," "Moses," "Do Science and the Bible Agree?" "The Non-fulfilment of Prophecy," and "The Plan of Redemption." The first of this series is very good and each succeeding one is better. Mr. Phelps is a rousing lecturer, and the Freethinkers of Nipomo stand ready to recommend him to all who want to hear "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." After each lecture Mr. Phelps offered the floor to anyone who wished to make any comments or criticisms. As no one at first availed himself of this opportunity, resolutions were passed challenging the ministers to open discussion on the great subject of religion. In the meantime, Mr. L. D. Loyd, the resident M. E. minister, after hearing the first lecture, "hied him straight away" to the lady who owns the large hall here, and used all his influence to close it against Freethought lectures, saying afterwards, when accused of this, that he did it because he felt that these lectures were poisoning the minds of the people. Well, copies of the aforesaid resolutions were sent to the resident minister, Mr. Loyd, and to a Baptist evangelist, by name J. Lawrence Rodgers, who is now stopping here. Both declined to debate the question, saying: "We could not hope to give lucid outlines of our belief in ten or a dozen lectures, much less in a single haphazard discussion." A committee was at once appointed to notify them that it was not haphazard discussions that we wanted, but clear and lucid arguments, and that they might have as many lectures as they thought necessary. Mr. Rodgers still declined to debate, but Mr. Loyd, being notified by Mr. Phelps that his sermon the previous Sunday on "The Fulfilment of Prophecy" was full of weak spots which he, Mr. Phelps, proposed to show up, came out with his "notes" and a newspaper article to read, intending, no doubt, to make a reply to the lecture. But his religious zeal overcame his good manners to such an extent that he interrupted Mr. Phelps in the midst of his lecture by clapping his hands long and loudly. Mr. Phelps asked "What's that?" Mr. Loyd replied, "How absurd, how absurd!" and started in to give us an "exegetic treatment" (as he would say) of his views. But Mr. Phelps "knew his rights and dared maintain them," giving Mr. Loyd a well-merited and scathing rebuke. He was compelled, however, to threaten to swear out a complaint before this "meek and lowly follower of the blessed Jesus" would sit quiet and await his turn to speak. Mr. Phelps kindly divided his time with him, though, and then Mr. Loyd had the unmitigated gall (in the face of his ineffectual attempt to close the hall against us) to say that he believed in free thought and investigation himself. Yes, free thought so long as you think as he does, and investigation within proscribed limits; after that, compulsion. No, thank you, we want no such shadow of a glorious reality. A portion of the Christian element here signed and presented a petition to send away somewhere for a minister to debate with Mr. Phelps, and this plan was agreed upon, the question to read, "Resolved, That the Bible is entirely of human origin and inculcates an imperfect code of morals." This debate must begin inside of thirty days and continue at least six evenings, two hours each evening.

Yours in the interest of free thought, free speech, and free press,

BERTHA WILSON FOREMAN.

Must Give Antidotes, if We Would Kill Poisons.

LENNOX, S. DAK., Feb. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The first copy of your journal of reform came into my hands about six weeks ago. My first impressions of its benefits to mankind were not elating, but as I became better acquainted with its contents I began to admire the pluck of its promoters in trying to purge the present civilization of its barbarian superstitions, and this in the face of the army of doctors whose very existence depends on the prevalence of disease. This was the first literature of the kind that I ever read, and I was somewhat surprised at its boldness; but my experience with educated and self-thinking men has led me to believe that the majority of such are infidels or very poor Christians, but they do not care to show it. In fact, this has been my own plan. I would look upon a Christian with pity, not for his existence (for nature would be as impartial to him as she is to all), but for his lack of knowledge of the vast amount of positive evidence in nature that his faith is based on absurd superstitions, and for me to relieve him of his error in judgment was to educate him in science, no small undertaking when we consider the knowledge-gathering ability of such and the material to be benefited. Your articles no doubt will reach all such as are unable to pursue the sciences for deeper foundation. I think no one recognizes more keenly than I do the hindrance to the mental development of mankind that these superstitious teachings are; how, from infancy, the basis of our reason is dwarfed by them, which later in life causes submission to conditions whose causes should be investigated and overcome. But what are we going to do about it? In most cases we do well if we educate our own household, while church dogma is being taught from countless pulpits at least once a week. To be sure, we have the argument, but the subject is deep, and there is but a small proportion of the people who will get evidence and do their own thinking. A united effort to establish places in towns where the facts of the case could be promulgated by competent speakers would answer the purpose, but it would be likely to throw the clergy into such rage that we might get another dark age.

With all our boasted civilization, we hardly dare do our own thinking. This I was obliged to do from my surroundings. A baptized son of Christian parents, I had all the instructions of such unfortunates up to the age of sixteen. From twelve I made my own way unassisted, obtained scientific education, succeeded in partially disposing of the superstitions hanging to me, began to reason on religion with the same process as governs in science, and my faith vanished. I returned to theology, but all is discord with nature, a mind-created philosophy, and I find myself an unbeliever, with reverence only for the laws of nature by which my existence was brought about. For this the Christians may look upon me with contempt as though a criminal, but I feel proud of my discovery and position, and am satisfied that my morality, based on justice and right, is on a higher level than that of a Christian for reward or fears of punishment.

I would like to set some of my friends to do a little thinking for themselves, and would like to have you send me the books named herein. Inclosed please find $6, which I think will cover cost.

Yours very truly, A. SLAMAN, M.D.

God's Law and Man's Law.

BERWICK, Dec. 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Not once, nor twice, but many times have we heard it urged that the laws of man are founded on the laws of God; meaning those unjust and arbitrary commands laid down in that volume known as Holy Writ. Just how far the laws of man are in accordance with the commands of the Christian and Hebrew deity I will attempt to show.

Turning first to the Ten Commandments, which the almighty sculptor engraved on two tables of stone amid the thunderings and lightnings of Mt. Sinai, we find the two greatest of these, the first and second, to which the prophet has devoted four verses of holy writ, entirely disregarded by our civil governments and every man worshiping whatsoever god he pleases. As to the third, imagine the consequence if a fine were imposed every time the name of the Christian deity was taken in vain. Methinks if the recording angel himself keeps the weekly accounts straight, he must sit up late Saturday night to balance his books.

"Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." This is a point on which so much has been said and written, in the past year or two, that it would be superfluous for me to add more. Suffice it to say that the command reads, literally, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," and that, instead of this command being favored and supported by our "Christian government," a few zealous Adventists and Jews are harassed and persecuted for keeping the day that the Lord commanded them to keep, and along with these a few honest skeptics are fined and imprisoned for laboring on the very day of the week on which the almighty laid the foundations of heaven and earth. But as the Sabbath was changed by the successors of St. Peter, we are to understand, I suppose, that God didn't know his own business, and instead of laying off the seventh day, he should have pegged away at his creation contract harder than ever, and taken the first day of the week to hold prayer-meetings and redeem the souls he had predestined to eternal punishment.

The fifth command it would be difficult for any civil government to maintain in a free and enlightened country. A child's conscience is its own, and no civil law has any bearing on it whatever. Even those who attempt to keep the law from a sense of religious duty seldom appear to live any longer in consequence. This fifth command appears to be another of those little "bluff games" in which Jehovah seemed to take so much delight in those good old days.

The foul crime of murder smells so rank in the nostrils of the deity that he has devoted to its denunciation amidst his Sinaitical thunderings only four words averaging four letters each. The only crime that our laws consider deserving of capital punishment has been scarcely worth introducing into these divine commands, and has been so introduced as to hardly distinguish whether it pertains to the killing of our fellowmen or of the wild beasts of the forest. So with the seventh, eighth, and ninth. The foulest crimes on our statute books are expressed in as brief a manner as possible; for these stone tables must be as hard as flint, and the Lord must be weary of carving by this time.

The last command is too arbitrary and ridiculous to be debated. If we are hungry we must not wish in our hearts for the food that burdens the table of the wealthy. If we are cold we must not long for the robes that are passing us each moment in pompous luxury. The merchant may close his shop; no one desires his merchandise. Thy neighbor has a house to sell, a horse, a sheep, an ox, or an ass; we do not covet them, he may keep his own. Trade stagnates, business comes to a standstill, humanity dies and decays because we obey the tenth commandment.

So of the ten commandments the Lord spake unto Moses; six are entirely disregarded, and the four least are incorporated in our legislation.

We cannot dwell at length on all the commands issued from the darkness of Sinai as recorded in the following chapters. They belong to an age of superstition, of ignorance and slavery. But what a memory Moses must have had to treasure all these remarks and record them in after life for the guidance of the children of Israel, and what must have been his feeling of chagrin and vexation when, after he had undergone all this nervous and mental strain, he returned to the valley and found his faithless followers worshipping the golden calf made with hands instead of the almighty calf he had left thundering and bellowing on Mount Sinai!

But when we turn to the New Testament we are coming nearer home. Here we have the second person of the trinity denouncing divorce, which is readily granted by any civilized court; and saying the first and greatest commandment is to love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, etc., "and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Any remarks on this point would be superfluous. It is enough to say that one clause in the passage is very appropriate, "The second is like unto it," for surely two commands were never better mated.

Finally, we read in James ii, 10, that "whosoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all," so that when a man is convicted of lifting chickens he should be incarcerated for arson, and if he is found guilty of petty larceny he should be hanged for murder. Methinks there is much wisdom here.

Are the laws of man founded on the laws of divine inspiration? Then would our streets run red with the blood of persecution; then would our old women be burned as witches, and our children bound out as slaves; the dearest ties of humanity be trampled in the dust, and misfortune, from birth or accident, be branded as the blackest crimes on the calendar.

No! Reason has snatched the reins from Superstition. Humanity has supplanted blind Fanaticism. The world moves on toward the goal of Liberty and Equality. Reason, Knowledge, Science—this is the Trinity we have established, and it is one that will endure. The day is not far off when the last shade of superstition will be obliterated, and the world will emerge at last into the full light of Liberty and Truth.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

THE Spanish authorities have declared martial law in Cuba, where an insurrection was begun two weeks or more ago. It is not generally thought that there will be a very severe or protracted struggle, as the patriots do not appear to be at all formidable.

THE New York Assembly passed the bill to compel the railroads to issue free passes to legislators and state officials, in face of the prohibition of the issue of such passes which was incorporated in the new constitution by the Constitutional Convention of last year.

PROFESSOR JOHN STUART BLACKIE died in Edinburgh, March 2. Born in Glasgow in 1809 he lived to become one of the most famous of modern educators. He was in love with Greek for more than six decades, and he taught it for thirty years, knowing it as he knew English. Professor Blackie was a constant reader of Greek newspapers and had the best Greek library in the United Kingdom.

THE trial of Police Captain Doherty for bribery terminated in the discharge of the jury after eighteen hours' deliberation, the vote standing at the end of that time, as at the beginning, three for conviction and nine for acquittal. Doherty was released on $7,500 bail.

THE Times and Herald of Chicago have been consolidated, and the first issue of the Times-Herald appeared on March 4. James W. Scott is editor-in-chief and publisher and Henry W. Hawley managing editor. This is now the only Democratic morning paper in the city.

UTAH'S Constitutional Convention met at noon of March 4. One hundred and seven delegates were elected on Nov. 6, of whom 102 have received certificates of election, there being a contest regarding five from one Salt Lake precinct. Of those seated 57 are Reps. and 45 Dems. The Mormon element has about three-fourths majority, which fact insures the adoption of woman suffrage and probably prohibition. The "Gentile" element is strongly opposed to woman suffrage.

ON March 1 a building which was being torn down in this city fell and five men were killed and others injured. On the same day the core of a tenement house in course of construction on Orchard street collapsed without warning and eleven men were injured, some very badly.

THE New York Court of Appeals holds that Trinity Church Corporation must pay the fines assessed against it for failure to supply water to its tenants above the first floor of tenements. Still its trustees manifest a strong disinclination to act in accordance with the decision of the court.

ON Feb. 26 a big meeting was held at Terrace Garden, this city, to start a movement favorable to more liberal excise laws for Sunday. Singing, athletic, social, benevolent, labor, and other associations were represented. The total membership of these societies is said to be 120,000.

THE West Side Publishing Company has been incorporated in Chicago with a capital of $500,000. It is to publish a daily paper under the control of the Typographical Union. No typesetting machines will be used, thus furnishing employment to many compositors thrown out of work by those devices.

IMMEDIATELY following the presentation of the polyglot prohibition petition to the president by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Representative Blair, of New Hampshire, introduced a joint resolution for an amendment to the Constitution forbidding the liquor traffic in the states and territories.

PRINCE BISMARCK is not favorable to the Anti-Revolution bill now pending in the German Reichstag. To Baron Von Stumm-Halberg he declared that it was a still-born child, which, intended to restrain one dangerous element of the population, threatened the liberties of all, and hence was acceptable to none.

ISMAIL PASHA, ex-Khedive of Egypt, died in Constantinople on March 2. He was a very important figure in Eastern affairs for many years. He ruled and wasted from 1863 to 1879, his extravagance resulting in the fastening upon his country of the first fetters of Western authority. He was born in Egypt in 1830.

THE Palisades of the Hudson are to be protected, on the New Jersey side, Governor Wertz having signed the bill passed by the legislature, which forbids further leasing of the water front to stone contractors or others. What is still needed is something that will prevent further blasting under existing leases, and this will be provided if Senator Winton's bill creating a state park of the water front is adopted.

A MEETING was held in East Greenwich, London, on Feb. 25 to protest against the continued imprisonment of Mrs. Maybrick. A resolution expressing surprise that the Home Secretary, Henry Asquith, had refused the requisition signed by 3,000 responsible persons and presented to him by T. P. O'Connor, M.P., asking that a chance be afforded Mrs. Maybrick to petition for a public rehearing of her case, was adopted.

THE People's Rights party of Russia has issued an address to the Czar, in which he is plainly told that the speech in which he announced his adherence to the policy of autocratic rule has killed his popularity, and he is warned that, as he was the one to begin the struggle, it will ere long be taken up on the other side. The author of the manifesto is said to be Count Tolstoi. It is declared that a "peaceful but obstinate and deliberate struggle necessary to achieve liberty" will be inaugurated.

THE third session of the Fifty-Third Congress expired at noon on March 4. One of its last acts was the incorporation in the Sundry Civil bill of an authorization for the appointment of nine delegates to an international monetary conference, three to be named by the Senate, three by the House, and three by the president. The Senate's choice fell on Henry M. Teller, of Colo., Rep., for silver; James K. Jones, of Ark., Dem., for silver, and John W. Daniel, of Va., Dem., for silver. The House selected Speaker Charles F. Crisp, of Ga., Dem., for silver; David B. Culberson, of Texas, Dem., for silver, and Robert R. Hitt, of Ill., Rep. and moderate bimetalist. The president has not made his choice.

Sickness Among Children

Gems of Thought.

I KNOW no great men but those who have rendered great services to humanity.—Voltaire.

THE church cannot help you to trade tenement houses for heavenly mansions.—New York World.

THE destroyers of the old are the creators of the new. As time sweeps on the old passes away and the new in its turn becomes old.—Ingersoll.

ADHERE to your act and congratulate yourself if you have done something strange and extravagant, and broken the monotony of a decorous age.—R. W. Emerson.

UNATTAINABLE as pure rectitude is, and will long continue to be, we must keep an eye on the compass which tells us whereabouts it lies, or we shall otherwise wander in the opposite direction.—Herbert Spencer.

It is not the business of the public schools to teach the manual of arms. Public school commissioners have more important duties to perform than to make quixotic suggestions entirely at variance with the public school system.—Jewish Messenger.

In truth, of all the intellectual weapons which have ever been wielded by man, the most terrible was the mockery of Voltaire. Bigots and tyrants, who had never been moved by the wailing and cursing of millions, turned pale at his name.—Macaulay.

FREEDOM is not for itself, but for what it will bring and for what it will allow. It is not good deed, but encouragement to good deed. It is not harvest but soil. It is not accomplishment; it is invitation. Freedom guards natural order. It protects the spontaneity of creation. It demands that effort be let alone—that the seed be left to its own effect.—Horace L. Traubel.

SUNDAY after Sunday the same ground of statement and argument is threshed over and over. It is the one point turned over and over: Be good. But what a good life means is either left to the hearer's inference or is explained in such a prosaic manner as to leave nothing tangible in the mind. What reflection of the age in which we live, of the problems with which we have to grapple, is there in the average sermon?—Henry W. Bok.

STUDY is the balance-wheel that the theological thinker needs. The tendency of religious thinking is to an abstract, imaginativ, poetic style, a fervid, irresponsible style, that aims more at making its point than it does at adhering to the prosaic facts—a style that is morbid, mystic, oftentimes bordering upon the bigoted and fanatical. A close familiarity with the exact, critical methods of scientific study is a salutary and correctiv restraint upon such tendency. It makes thought practical rather than ideal, logical rather than emotional, simple rather than elaborate, convincing rather than literary, substantial rather than effervescent.—Rev. Horace E. Warner.

It makes no difference that one book deals roughly with moral conventionalities,

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

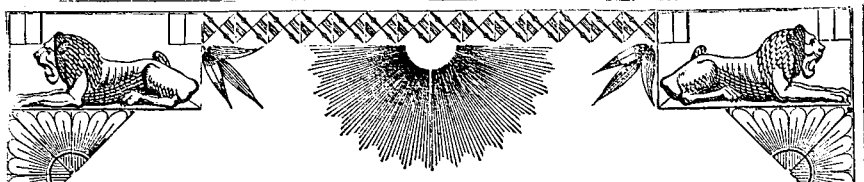

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominations. Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

while another attacks such as are theological. That may make a great deal of difference to our tastes and sentiments, but none at all as to the principle of justice. Every idea must have its influence on morals; whether that influence will be for good or evil cannot be determined by any foresight, least of all by the prejudices of those who do not hold that idea, who hate it, and have not impartially studied its bearings. Many of the best books in the world have been pronounced immoral and wicked in their time, and after it; and if the average commonplace of any period, as represented by judges that know only precedents, and jurors instructed by them, be allowed to suppress all thoughts and works that do not merely repeat the prevailing notions, all inquiry is at an end, all progress paralyzed.—Moncure D. Conway.

It was the bosom friends of Rev. Messrs. Harlan & Allen [the persecutors of Walt Whitman] who destroyed the great library of Alexandria, with its priceless classic treasures, and, in Cremona, in the year 1569, threw twelve thousand copies of the Talmud into the flames. It was such men as Messrs. Harlan & Allen who presided at those costly priest-kindled pyres that contained the entire pictorial archives of the Aztec race. They were present in spirit when the Turks destroyed the great library of Matthew Corvini at Buda; when Pope Gregory VII. devoted to the flames the rich classical library of the Palatine Apollo; when the Jesuits, by the command of the Austrian Emperor Ferdinand, encrimsoned the midnight skies of Bohemia with the flames of a nation's books, and when, in the reign of Henry VIII. the horse-faced Puritans made an auto-da-fé of costly books and rarest illuminated manuscripts from the monastic libraries.—Wm. Sloane Kennedy.

We are told that "all things are possible with God," and yet God cannot boil an egg in cold water.—Investigator.

UNTIL some great authority definitely locates the conscience, people will never know when they should repent, or take something for the liver.—Atchison Globe.

GRANDPA: "Well, Willie, you have been to church, haven't you?" Willie: "Yes, sir." "Well, what can you tell us about it?" Willie: "Why, sir, the man that sat in front of us had ears that wasn't alike."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

DEACON SCHLEY: "I was terribly shocked, my dear, to discover, on my way home from church, a match game of football being played on the vacant lot near the park." Mrs. Schley: "Was it that which makes you so very late, deacon?"

MRS. SCHLEY: "Doesn't that lot across the way belong to you? Then why do you allow those bill posters to stick up their horrid pictures of ballet dancers on it? I should like to know what you gain by it, anyhow?" Deacon Schley (meekly): "I get two tickets."

ELDER BERRY: "Land's sake! Parson, what makes you look so mad?" Parson Peasley (hotly): "Matter enough, deacon! I sent that story of mine about the owl and the old maid to a comic paper, and here they've sent it back with an insulting letter, saying it's not original." Elder Berry: (indignantly): "Why, the impudence of them fellows! An' I've heard you tell that story for thirty years."—Puck.

A SCHOOL INSPECTOR, examining a class in religious knowledge—the lesson being about our first parents in the Garden of Eden—remarked: "Now children, could a greater punishment have been given to the serpent than that of having to crawl on its belly and eat dust all the days of its life?" "Yes," said a bright little lad, "if he had had to walk on the pint o' his tail, that would have been a tickler." "Please, sir," said another, "was not that the way it walked before it was cursed?"

DR. DALLINGER has been preaching on "The Theology of Music." Man, he said, had carried music to its highest development, but he had not made it; he had only discovered it in nature where God put it. Well, we won't dispute this. We will just accept it for the sake of argument. God is the great original musician, and Mozart and Beethoven are only his imitators. But doesn't Dr. Dallinger think that the great original musician is sometimes out of tune? His famous musical box, the jackass, is a case in point. How came he to fit up such a discordant instrument? We invite Dr. Dallinger to clear up this mystery.—Freethinker.

PARSON WHANGDOODLE BAXTER, of the Thompson Street Blue Light Tabernacle, on arriving at his place of worship one Sunday morning was surprised to find no one present but Sam Johnson, the sexton. "What de debil am de matter dat dar's nobody heah?" "Nobody heah becase dar's a notice in the Freeman's Journal dat dar would be no service becase ob de disunwellness ob de pasture." "Did dat fool niggah editor put dat notice in his paper for a fac?" "He did dat berry ting." "Wall, I declar." I told him 'stinotly de notice of my disunwellness was intended for de Sunday arter nex'.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address, F. J. He am a fool if eber dar was one."—Texas Siftings.

HAS the editor of the Protestant Standard fallen a victim to the wiles of the Jesuits? It would almost seem so. The issue of that lively oracle of Orangeism for July 20 contains some alleged poetry, headed "The Glorious Twelfth," by "True Blue." It appears to have escaped the editor's notice that the "poem" is an acrostic, and that the initial letters read: "The editor is a — fool." Nor is this all. Following the heading is what purports to be a Latin quotation from Virgil, but is really very vulgar English with the division of the words misplaced. However, the editor may console himself with the reflection that, for once, the Protestant Standard had a ready sale, and copies were attainable only with great difficulty.—London Freethinker.

THE Rev. Mr. Jasper, of Richmond, has been smitten with rationalism. The able divine of colored visage saw the improbability of the ordinary understanding of Jonah's adventures with the whale, so he has formulated a theory more in harmony with good sense. Hear him: "Dat country war a sea shoah, an' de hotels dey was named atah de tings ob de sea. Dah was de Sailor's Rest, de Mariner's Retreat, de Seafaring Men's Home, an' a lot ob sich places jest as yo' kin fin' em at Norfolk now. Among dese places was one called de Whale's Belly. Jonah come along, an' he didn' hab no scrip in his purse. He staid dar tree days, an' when de landlady found he didn' hab any money she spewed him out. As President of all the nationally-organized Freethought of this country, Mr. Putnam will, about May 1st, start for a visit to the Freethinkers of England. Officially and privately he will undoubtedly have a grand reception. England is a great country in a small space, with a big history, in which Freethought has played and is playing a conspicuous part.

While he is gone Mr. Putnam will be duly commissioned as correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will write for the benefit of our readers the generals and particulars of his trip. Every American Freethinker will find these letters by Mr. Putnam vastly entertaining, instructive, poetic, and good reading.

Superstition in the Colleges.

Do some people think that superstition is dead, and that therefore we may rest on our oars? January 31 was observed all over Christendom as a day of prayer for the higher educational institutions. The Noonday Prayer-Meeting joined in the "universal supplication." At a New York meeting there were present titled representatives from several medical colleges. Think of doctors and surgeons giving their countenance to the superstition of prayer to a figment of the unscientific imagination! Dr. Gayde, of the New York Homeopathic Medical College, and who is "prominently connected with the religious movement in medical colleges," gave an address on the development of the Young Men's Christian Association in said colleges. A graduate of Harvard, who is now in Union Theological Seminary, talked about the condition of the Young Men's Christian Association in the first-named school, stating that the Association's work had a "distinct evangelical tendency," and that it had "greatly influenced the tone of both the students' life and the chapel services." It was shown that during January 2,147 requests for prayer on special topics had been received by the Noonday Prayer-Meeting, many of these from Young Men's Christian Associations in various colleges. Dr. E. Lawrence Hunt, secretary of the Student's Club, gave an outline of the progress of the religious movement in the College of Physicians and Surgeons and the University Medical College, in both of which there are branches of the Young Men's Christian Association. While scientific schools are thus permeated with the delusions of orthodoxy there is certainly work for aggressive Infidelity to do, as well as for defensive Liberalism. Do not these medical men know that had not the power of the church been weakened by the influence of Freethought there would be no place in the modern Christian world for science? Why do they nurse the enemy that well-nigh destroyed civilization? The world has a right to expect better things from its educated men. And yet, in spite of these evidences that Christianity still lives for mischief, we are told by many specialists in reform that there is no longer any necessity for fighting the church, that there is other much more important work at hand. Strange, indeed, that sensible men and women should take this position when they can see that the poison of anti-naturalism is corrupting knowledge at its fountain heads and the artillery of theocracy is trained on the last defenses of human liberty and justice.

Protestant Jesuits in the Senate.

In the Senate on the 21st of February there was a prolonged and spirited debate over the Indian school question. Mr. Cockrell, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, said that fifteen or twenty schools had been left out because they were denominational schools. In this list were included the Indian school at Hampton, Va., and the Lincoln school at Philadelphia, both being Protestant schools; that is, denominational schools. He said that it had been the intention of the committee to eternally separate church and state so far as lay in its power. Mr. Hunton, of Virginia, asserted that the school at Hampton was entirely undenominational, and Mr. Quay, of Pennsylvania, made a like statement regarding the Lincoln school. It is perfectly safe to assume, on general principles, that the Lincoln school is just the opposite of what Senator Quay says it is, for he is incapable of reaching a fair conclusion on such a question. As to Mr. Hunton, his reputation is better, but still the presumption is that no school of the kind of that at Hampton can be other than denominational; that is, Protestant, as distinguished from Catholic. Senator Wolcott, of Colorado, said that the holding of religious services in a school on "the Sabbath day" did not make that school a denominational institution. If the Senator can see no more clearly on the financial issue than he does in regard to this matter, the people of his state are represented by a blind man. Lodge of Massachusetts, Daniel of Virginia, and Hawley of Connecticut, maintained that the Hampton and the Lincoln schools were not denominational. Mr. Cockrell spoke again and affirmed with emphasis that they were. He said that he was a Protestant of Protestants, but he was determined to do justice to all classes. "When we say that church and state must be separated, we mean it, so far as we are concerned," he declared. And that is right where the brave Senator from Missouri differs from such "patriots" as Quay and Hawley of odorous memory. It was Hawley who closed the Centennial Exposition on Sunday, and let his personal friends in on the sly, and it was Quay who worked so hard to close the Columbian Exposition on the priests' day and is in the Senate only because he owns a "machine." When these men say that they believe in the separation of church and state they do not mean it.

Continuing, Mr. Cockrell said that the bill came up from the house with seven Catholic schools that had been in former bills stricken out, presumably because they were Catholic schools, but with the two now in dispute retained. His committee did not believe that this was just, and so the Hampton and Philadelphia institutions were also dropped. Quay asked if there was any evidence that these schools were Protestant schools. "Yes, abundant evidence," Mr. Cockrell replied. "It is not denied. Nobody can deny it. When an Indian Catholic child at Lincoln school wanted to attend a Catholic church she was told by one of the teachers that an Episcopal school was good enough for her." But in spite of the gallant fight for equal justice and genuine separation of the civil and the religious made by the Missourian, the Senate, by the vote of 32 to 21, decided to retain the appropriations for the Hampton and Lincoln schools. The amount voted to the former was $20,400, and to the latter $33,400. This illustrates anew our frequent contention that the average Protestant means by the phrase "separation of church and state," nothing more than the shutting out of the Catholic from participation in state-granted privileges, and the denial to the Freethinker and Adventist of common citizen rights. The "Christian Secularist" is an infertile hybrid, a fraud, and a menace to human rights.

The facts concerning the Hampton school are that its superintendent, Rev. Mr. Frizzell, is a Congregational clergyman, and it has a regular chaplain, Rev. Mr. Turner, who is also, of course, a Protestant. So much for the "unsectarian" character of this school. Another Senator who was shown up in his true colors by the debate and subsequent vote was Gallinger of New Hampshire, who is a vociferous supporter of the "National League for the Protection of American [Protestant] Institutions." He made one of his stereotyped speeches in favor of "the complete separation of church and state," and then proceeded to vote for the retention in the bill of these appropriations for the two sectarian schools. What do you think of these one-sided "patriots"?

During the debate Hawley declared that, while the Hampton school was not sectarian, he would rather have "a Catholic school, run by Jesuits, than a school with no God in it." No doubt, and if he and the Protestant "separationists" for whom he speaks cannot maintain the common schools of the country as Protestant schools, they will join hands with the Catholics to crush out all opposition and then parcel out the spoils between the two great divisions of the church. Anything rather than consent to secular education, which places all the people on the plane of equal liberty.

The Man and the Work.

"The 'Age of Reason' begins with a statement of his [Paine's] belief in God and immortality; in the equality of man, and that religion consists in doing justice, in loving mercy, and in endeavoring to make our fellow creatures happy. This done, he begins to enumerate the things he does not believe in. His brave affirmations would not fill one page of his book; his negations cover all the remaining pages."—Rev. M. M. Mangasarian.

Where was the bravery in declaring for the existence of a God and the immortality of the soul? Here Paine but voiced the sentiment of the Theistic and Christian world, and he had no cause to fear the maledictions and ostracism of the masses of the people. Mr. Mangasarian's characterization is correct so far as the other enumerated affirmations are concerned, but his implication that the so-called negativ work of Paine did not require courage is not supported by a single fact. In criticising the Bible, Paine did that which was sure to earn him the distrust and the hatred of the people and of the all but omnipotent clergy. The Bible was then the Protestant fetish and the Catholic tool, as it is today, although at that time there were no "Higher Critics" and no "Societies of Ethical Culture"; they were rendered possible by the destructive criticism of Paine and men like him and the patient investigation of the scientific students. The one thing above all others needed at that time was a man who had the courage and the ability to go to the common people as well as the scholars with a negativ criticism of the Bible. Paine had the courage and the ability; he had also the ear of Europe and of America, for he had done masterful work for political liberty, and he would be heard. The church claimed that the Bible was the perfect work of a perfect god; with this chain of infallibility it bound the minds of men. It was the business of Paine to show that the Bible was the work of imperfect men, and he did it; for that crime the church has never pardoned him. It was no part of his task to hunt for good things in the Bible—the church asserted that it was all good; what he had to do was to prove that it was not all good, and that is precisely what he did. Such inept criticisms as those of Mr. Mangasarian are very wearying.

In the Wolverine State.

Just a word to the Freethinkers of Michigan: Here is a bill introduced in your state Senate on February 8th by Senator Joseph R. McLaughlin of Detroit. It was reported favorably on February 14th, and has passed the Senate:

A Bill to require theaters, opera houses, dance halls, and other places of public amusement, diversion, game or play to be closed on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, and to prohibit the carrying on or engaging in acting, opera singing, ticket selling, or any other manner of labor, business, or work in any theater, opera house, dance hall, or other place of public amusement, diversion, game, or play on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday.

Section 1. The people of the state of Michigan enact, That all theaters, opera houses, dance halls, and other places of public amusement, diversion, game, or play shall be closed on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday. The foregoing provision shall not apply to the opening of any such places for religious worship.

Sec. 2. No person shall carry on, engage in, or do any acting, opera singing, ticket selling, or any other manner of labor, business, or work in any theater, opera house, dance hall, or other place of public amusement, diversion, game or play at any time when the same is by the preceding section of this act required to be closed.

Sec. 3. Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than ten dollars nor more than one hundred dollars and costs of prosecution, and imprisonment in the county jail for not more than sixty days, in the discretion of the court. And in case such fine shall not have been paid at the time such imprisonment expires, he, the person serving out such sentence, shall be further detained in jail until such fine and costs shall have been fully paid: Provided, That in no case shall the whole term of imprisonment exceed sixty days.

You will observe that this infamous measure declares that American citizens shall be imprisoned for the offense of providing entertainment for their fellow-citizens on Sunday; that it makes singing a misdemeanor to be punished by immurement in jail. Will you submit to this without protest or resistance? Here is a letter from the legislator who drafted this despicable bill:

LANSING, MICH., March 5, 1895.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed bill has passed the Senate. It is only a repetition of an existing law, with a penalty added, and I know of no opposition to it.

Very respectfully, J. R. McLAUGHLIN.

Is it not time that Senator McLaughlin heard of some opposition to this contemplated crime? He says that it is only a repetition of an existing law with a penalty added. Inasmuch as a law is inoperative without a penalty, this is to all intents and purposes a new law, or will be if you permit it to become a law at all. Do you think that it will pay to allow this ravishment of your rights to go on from year to year without a blow struck in defense? Did you ever hear of a people that won or maintained independence by sitting down and holding out its hands for the manacles of the tyrant? Do you want to become the serfs of the church? Note the insulting discrimination incorporated in this embryo law—you may on Sunday go into a theater, opera house, dance house, or other place of amusement if it is opened for religious services, but you cannot enter it for secular entertainment, for it is forbidden to open it therefor on the priests' day; you may sing in a church choir, with or without pay, but if you sing in an opera, to jail you go. And there is "no opposition" in Michigan to this foul denial of the commonest citizen rights! If not already too late, go to Lansing; besiege the House; demand a hearing before the committee that has the bill in charge; deluge your representatives with the right kind of literature; talk to the man who votes for your district; assert yourself and fight with every weapon of reason and political influence at your command. Send the meddling priests back to their pulpits with stern notification to stop their traitorous scheming. Why, their presumption is intolerable and unpardonable. Think of the insolence of their demand that all forms of Sunday entertainment but their own shall be prohibited under penalty of imprisonment for disobedience! Drive them out of the halls of legislation.

Since our last acknowledgment was made we have received for the Fleckten school fight in Minnesota $1 from Geo. Hendee and $2.50 from S. Pabst. To the Free Sunday Fund there has been contributed $2 from J. P. Palmer, $2.75 from J. E. Marden, $5 from Louis Levine, and $5 from S. Pabst. This is encouraging and we hope that others will emulate the good example set by these friends. We find it difficult to notice, as the importance of the issue demands, the fresh aggressions of the Sabbatarians.

A large number of Liberals have taken advantage of our combination offer of THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" for $6.50, and we are confident that thousands more would do so within the course of the coming year if they only realized how much there is in that offer for the money. You get in THE TRUTH SEEKER a volume of 832 big pages and 104 of Heston's taking cartoons, and in the Secular Pilgrim's book you get 874 octavo pages, and 141 full-page portraits of the leaders of humanity, dead and living. Take another look at pages 162 and 173.

"Color is no disqualification for membership in the Ohio Club of Chicago, which is made up of women. Toleration is the first lesson of Christianity."—Kate Field's Washington.

We fail to see the connection of toleration with the presence or absence of prejudice concerning the Negro. If we use the word toleration in the same sense in which it is generally employed, no statement could be further from the truth than this, that "toleration is the first lesson of Christianity." It is neither the first nor the last; of all the theological systems that have afflicted the world Christianity has been the least tolerant of differences and of those who entertained them.

If you send us fifty cents for a trial subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months, you will have the satisfaction of knowing that you put into the hands of your friend, or of some acquaintance, the means whereby he or she may be led to become an interested watcher and active promoter of the intellectual and ethical development of the people. There is no knowing how much good such a trial subscription may do; many a time a sample copy alone has enlisted a zealous soldier in the army of peaceful progress. If you can afford to fill that subscription blank which you will find on page 162 with names of trial subscribers, or can get that many men to give you fifty cents each for that purpose, so much the better.

On February 24th, at Petersburg, Ind., Rev. Mr. Omelvina, Presbyterian, laid down the law of the church in fine style. He remarked that "prayer-meetings and other services of the Lord are to be observed before any secret lodge duties are in order." This is a matter that concerns only the members of the church and of the secret societies—as they are in these various organizations of their own free choice, they can either submit to the dictation of the minister or get out of the church. But when the clergyman begins to talk of rebellion if the state does not permit him to run his neighbors' affairs on Sunday, we are at once interested and propose to have something to say in the discussion that must follow his shriek of defiance. Listen to him:

"If the government continues as it has for the last twenty-five years in disregarding the Sabbath, it is the duty of the Presbyterians and Methodists and all the rest of the Lord's people to defy it and destroy it off the face of the earth; to rise up as one man, and put it down."

That is, if these theocrats cannot force their religion down the throats of the people at the point of the federal bayonet, they are going to deluge the land in blood at the trumpet call of a "Thus saith the Lord"! This is a characteristic pronouncement; it is one of the most consistently religious utterances of which we have heard for some time—rule or ruin is the traditional policy of the church. Do not these Covenanters simpletons know that they are doing their best to commit suicide? They owe their liberty to the secular principle which they despise and hate. Where would their comparatively small church be if the theocratic principle should become imbedded in the federal law? As the correspondent says who sent us the report of the sermon of Mr. Omelvina, "such United States citizenship is equaled only by the gratitude of the man who beat his horse to death because he was ashamed to acknowledge that he owed his life to the faithful beast."

"Mere Freethinkers" are reminded of this remark made by J. A. Froude:

"As for the superstitions investing Christianity, they inevitably molder, and hardly concern us so much as the growing superstitions which fancy themselves reasonable and progressive."

The trouble is that the "growing superstitions" have their root in Christianity and Theism, as a rule, and hence the sanction and shelter of those superstitions; and while the parent delusions retain their authority over the minds of men but little can be done for the emancipation of humanity from the chains of the newer superstitions. In fact, many of the so-called "growing superstitions" are not new at all; they are simply the old besotted tyrannies in new guises. Theology has merely adapted itself to the changed conditions of this age, and instead of crushing the aspirations and the happiness of men in the name of God employs other but equally awe-inspiring catch-words with which to anesthetize the masses while it robs and enslaves them. There can be no great advance for the race while it is dominated and deluded by supernatural moralities; Christianity is essentially the enemy of freedom and justice, and it directs our practical life to-day, either openly or through subtle agencies. He is not a prudent leader who underrates its strength; he fatally misestimates the terrible power of ingrained customs, the fierce persistence of hereditary tendencies. Our Freethought is only individual as yet; it is not racial, it is not in the blood of the people. Notice how very frequently the children of Liberals go into the church. As Grant Allen well says in "The Woman Who Did," "Heredity of mental and moral qualities is a precarious matter. These things lie, as it were, on the topmost plane of character; they smack of the individual, and are therefore far less likely to persist in offspring than the deeper-seated and better-established peculiarities of the family, the clan, the race, or the species. They are idiosyncratic. Indeed, when we remember how greatly the mental and moral faculties differ from brother to brother, the product of the same two parental factors, can we wonder that they differ much more from father to son, the product of one like factor alone, diluted by the addition of a relatively unknown quality, the maternal influence?" No, there is still plenty of work for the "mere Freethinker."

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week contribute to the columns of the Chicago Tribune. That journal, referring to the attempt to prevent freedom of speech in Hoboken, N. J., says that the fatal mistake made by the ministers of that town was in taking any notice whatever of Colonel Ingersoll, who "long ago ceased to have any influence in his attacks upon the Bible and Christianity. . . . If the ministers will let him alone the people will, for they are tired of him and his stale repetitions of cynicism and poor wit which he has so long employed as substitutes for reason and argument." The Tribune is evidently prejudiced in favor of the stale platitudes of the pulpit, which have been reiterated now for some two thousand years without gaining anything in truth or beauty from their continuous use. The Chicago paper also says:

"Colonel Ingersoll was not only gratified that he had secured his opportunity to arraign the Bible but he improved the occasion to score the 'savages' who made the statute which so nearly tripped him up and to roast 'the priests' who had tried to stop his lecture. The Colonel, indeed, became so bitter in his assaults upon the latter as to arraign his own reputation for tolerance and charity, especially when he declared that there were persons in Hoboken who would gladly bring fagots and build a fire around him. All this and much other silly stuff Colonel Ingersoll poured out upon his audience. All of which goes to show that his intolerance is worse even than the intolerance he charges against the ministers. There is no more uncharitable man in the world than Colonel Ingersoll. There is no degree of abuse to which he will not descend in assailing those who do not believe as he does. The odium theologicum is mild as compared with the Ingersoll odium."

It will be very easy to show the fallacies of this deliverance. Colonel Ingersoll is no more intolerant than was Voltaire, who devoted his splendid abilities to the destruction of intolerance. As it is preposterous to say that the right to liberty includes the right to hold slaves, so it is utterly illogical to assume that he who is battling for freedom of speech should refrain from holding up to ridicule and contempt those who would deny freedom of speech. We would remind the Tribune that it is good Bible doctrine that they who take the sword shall find their own quietus on its point, and the Hoboken ministers have no one but themselves to thank for the pricking they received from Colonel Ingersoll's keen blade. But—and this is the vital distinction between the Freethinker and the Christian priest—while Colonel Ingersoll uses only the weapon of the mind, the priest is eager to wield the knife of the legal executioner. When Rev. Mr. Beatty invoked the law to silence the heretic he unfurled the black flag and enrolled himself in the infamous ranks of the pirates who scour the seas of thought.

At the recent hearing on the Excise law before the committee of the Assembly at Albany, there were so many preachers and other representatives of the Sunday people that Freethought's champion—Adolph Bierck, attorney and secretary of THE TRUTH SEEKER—did not get an opportunity to present his argument, but he has the promise of the committee that he shall be heard in the near future, and with this we must be content for the present. The clerics and their allies had the first chance to speak, as they had taken time by the forelock and got in their applications very early, but the opposition to the extreme church position was voiced by Otto Kempner, ex-Senator Boyd, and other representatives of the singing, athletic, and labor associations, and the trade interests which are working for a modification of the existing law. Not one day nor two days would have sufficed to exhaust the list of attorneys for superstition and repression. The preachers were in such numbers that, as Mr. Bierck remarks, "they considered themselves able to direct the whole trend of further legislation in the Empire state, and there was not one who did not bear upon his face a self-satisfied smile that proclaimed it." But not a smile curled the lips of the women who represented the religious societies in various parts of the state, and "they looked defiance at the committee and at about every man who did not look like a parson." On the other side of the Assembly room sat the delegates from sixteen German singing societies, the liquor dealers' associations, state and city, the spokesmen of the labor unions, of different cities, and advocates of the measures introduced by the Excise Reform Association, as well as delegations coming from other interests in all parts of the state. Bishop Doane of the Episcopal church was the first speaker: "He planted himself firmly and squarely on the ground that the proposed legislation in favor of a less restricted Sunday was an attack upon that day as a religious institution which it was the duty of the state to protect, as such. His entire argument was based upon this misconception." Mr. Kempner made a moderate and sensible speech on the other side, and then from the close of his address to "the hour of adjournment the delegates were engaged, and anathemas and rhetorical pyrotechnics were hurled back and forth until the poor committee was completely used up and, in self-defense, went into executive session." Mr. Bierck will receive notification a week ahead of the next hearing, when he will do his best to make it interesting for the defenders of privilege, and to advance the cause of rational Sunday liberty.

It is lamentable that there is so little clear and coherent thought and utterance concerning problems upon the right solution of which depend so great an extent the comfort and happiness of the people. So much is taken for granted, especially where religious prejudices and interests are involved, which require impartial and dispassionate examination, that one is almost driven to despair of the reasoning powers of the average man. To illustrate: The Examiner (Baptist), after showing that the state has nothing to do with religion, beyond protecting the religious rights of the citizen, says:

"No one, under whatever guise, has a right to disturb the Sunday worship of his neighbors. No one has a right, on Sunday, to go through the streets with a band of music, or to cry his wares. But any work done that does not interfere with the rights of others is utterly out of the proper reach of the law."

Is not the Examiner substituting for the equal rights of all the citizens the religious rights of a part of the citizens? Why have not the members of the band, and those who wish to hear the music made by the band, the same right to the use of Sunday that the preacher and his congregation have? Why has not the salesman the same right to cry his wares on Sunday that the minister and the church organist have to perform the labor that brings them the means whereby they live? If it be answered that the minister does not make a noise of a disturbing nature, as do the bandsman and the pedler, and that no one is compelled to come within the range of his utterances, while many are forced to listen unwillingly to the notes of the band and the cries of the huckster, it should be said that this objection raises the issue of disturbance, not merely of disturbance on Sunday. We take it that the congregation has the same right to protection from noise on week-day evenings when it holds meetings that it has on Sunday. We take it that the lecturer, the teacher, the business man, all have the same right to protection from noise at any and all times that the congregation and its pastor have at any and all times. Therefore, we are bound to conclude that this is a question of equal human rights, instead of religious rights, and that all the laws that may be enacted to restrain the makers of noise must apply to all days alike, wholly regardless of any peculiar sanctity supposed by some persons to attach to one of those days, or to the particular use made of it by the fraction of the population that attends religious services. Another conclusion is that those of the people who like to hear the band, or to make purchases on Sunday or week-day evenings when there are religious services in the churches or a performance at the opera house or the theater, have the same right to demand that their wishes shall be respected that the other citizens have. If the principle of majority rule is to be respected these must decide, for there can be no question that very many more would rather hear a good band on Sunday than listen to the sermon of a minister. Necessarily there are many who would be glad to have much less noise on all days of the week, while there are many others who do not object to trains, and church bells, and bands, and labor's various sounds, on any day. Upon the whole we think that the less law there is in regard to these matters the better; even where there is actual invasion it may be wiser, generally, to leave the settlement of disputes to the persons immediately concerned, for unthreatened good sense and good will, inspiring to mutual concessions, will often do much more to secure order and peace than irritating statutes. At all events, we have no place in this country for laws based on the idea of religious rights or infidel rights; we can recognize only the rights of the plain citizen.

Charles Dudley Warner has charge of the "Editor's Study" in Harper's Magazine, and in that department in the issue for March we find these sentences:

"The ignorance of the Bible among students in our public schools and colleges furnishes a curious illustration of the inadequacy of our educational machine to meet the requirements of life. It is significant also of a deeper miscarriage of our social and political life. We seem to be astonished that we cannot have public virtue without private virtue, and that a fair legislative and executive machine will not produce an honest and temperate community."

This amounts to an assertion that our educational system would be adequate to meet the requirements of life if it was so organized as to impart a thorough knowledge of the Bible. No doubt an exhaustive study of the Bible along scientific and critical lines would do much to prepare the young man and woman for the struggles and temptations of life and thus conduce to the improvement of our politics and sociology, but this would not be an exceptional result—the scientific and critical study of Shakspeare would be at least equally beneficial. The important consideration, however, is that the advocates of Bible reading in the schools would be the uncompromising opposers of anything approaching an impartial examination of their fetish, in either common school or college. They want the book accepted as the revealed will of God, not studied as the production of fallible men. When Mr. Warner assumes that private virtue or political honesty would be augmented by the general inculcation of Bible principles as Christian teachers would inculcate them, he assumes that which is discredited by the history of the Christian world. The Caucasian has carried civilization to the four quarters of the globe, not because he is a Christian, but in spite of that fact. The impelling forces have been racial and geographical, not religious. But Christianity has done much to make the civilizing process a cruel and bloody one. Mr. Warner further remarks that if we can get good restraining laws on the statute books the friends of righteousness will have the same advantage that would be theirs if they had the Ten Commandments behind them. What is needed is not restraining laws that would be acceptable to intolerant preachers, but a return to the ideal of the fathers that it is the business of the state to defend the equal liberty of all citizens and stop right there. As to the Ten Commandments, half of them are obsolete or invasively immoral, and hence can be of no assistance to the instructor, the parent, or the statesman, while the others have their sources in the experience and necessities of the race, and therefore are not original with or confined to the Bible.

Great Reductions in Standard Freethought Works.

The popularity of our missionary scheme, by which Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is being scattered broadcast by the thousands, has induced us to lower the price of his other works, with the hope that they too will have a wider reading. From this date the prices of Paine's books will be as follows:

AGE OF REASON. Paper, 25 cents. Eight copies sent to as many different addresses for $1. Cloth, 50 cents.

EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Paper, 15 cents.

COMMON SENSE. The argument that did more than any other to convince the Revolutionary leaders of the necessity of the separation of this country from Great Britain. Paper, 15 cents.

THE CRISIS. Paine's great Revolutionary writings. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Answer to Burke's attack on the French Revolution. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PAINE'S GREAT WORKS IN ONE VOLUME. 8vo., 800 pp., cloth, $3, leather $4, morocco, gilt edges, $4.50. This book and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $5.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. One volume containing Common Sense, Crisis, and Rights of Man. Cloth, $1.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. One volume containing Age of Reason, Examination of the Prophecies, Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff, Essay on Dreams, Letters, etc. With Life of Paine and steel portrait. Cloth, $1.

We trust all our readers will do their best to scatter these splendid works all over the country.

FOR JUSTICE IN ARIZONA

A Strong Demand for the Taxation of Church Property.

GOOD WORK BEARING FRUIT.

As a Result of President Putnam's Campaign the Legislature is Memorialized to Amend the Tax Laws, and the Cities Where He Lectured Are at the Front in the Movement.

The question of the equal taxation of the property of the churches with that of the private citizen who has his money otherwise invested is up for discussion and decision in Arizona. They are a wide awake people out there, and so it did not take them long, after Mr. Putnam had called their attention to the gross injustice and great danger of favoritism in taxation, to determine on doing something to place the territory in line for the equal rights of all citizens. The petition given below was prepared for circulation, and within twenty-four hours it was signed, in Tucson alone, by more than one hundred and fifty persons, including many church members. This is its text:

To the Honorable Council and House of Representatives of Arizona Territory, Greeting:

The undersigned tax payers of said territory respectfully request and sincerely urge that you amend our revenue laws so that all property except that owned by the United States, by this territory, by the counties thereof, or by the municipal corporations therein, shall be assessed and a tax therefrom collected, so that the oft repeated phrase, that "all taxation shall be uniform and equal," may not be violated, and that all portions of the community may bear their equal share of burden.

In other words, we request and urge that you amend paragraph 2630 of the revised statutes of this territory by repealing subdivision 4 of said paragraph, which exempts from taxation the property of people of a certain class of religious views, while the property of another class who think differently is at all times subject to taxation; and which in our opinion violates that general rule that "all taxation shall be uniform and equal."

The press does not seem to be muzzled in Arizona as it is in various other parts of the country; at least, some of the editors are not reluctant about speaking out frankly and clearly on the side of "justice for all, privilege for none." In its issue of Feb. 23 the Arizona Daily Citizen of Tucson said editorially:

We publish elsewhere the copy of a petition which has been quite numerous signed in this city praying the legislature to pass a law imposing a tax on church property. The suggestion, we think, is an excellent one, and it is probable that something will be done in that direction. The question of the taxation of church property has been before the people of the states many times, and like all important reforms has many prejudices to combat, but the end sooner or later is ever destined to be reached.

At a meeting held in Milwaukee the other day, City Clerk Anderson delivered himself of a moving address, in which he said:

"It was a sad sight to see a congregation whose combined wealth was millions demanding exemption from tax on their princely cathedral, while the widow with three or four children is taxed remorselessly to meet every fund the city or county raises, the fund to pay the church for conducting its orphan asylums included. But the widow was weak and the church strong and wealthy."

There is no equality in such taxation, and equality before the law is the prerogative and right of every American citizen, and neither privileges nor rights should be granted to one that is a forbidden enjoyment to another. We say this with all due respect and reverence to churches and church organizations, but there is no justice in taxing any one man for the support of his neighbors' religion.

President James A. Garfield, who bore one of the names most revered in American history, a God-fearing Christian statesman, once said:

"The divorce between church and state ought to be absolute. It ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere, in any state, or in the nation, should be exempt from equal taxation; for if you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a tax on the whole community."

There is in the United States as determined by the census of 1890, a total value of church property amounting to $679,694,439, of which the Methodist denominations own and control $132,140,179; the Roman Catholic $118,371,366; Presbyterian, $94,869,097; Episcopal, $82,835,418; Baptist, $82,392,423; Congregationalist, $43,335,437; Lutheran, $35,060,354; Reformed, $18,744,242; Disciples of Christ, $12,206,038; Unitarian, $10,335,100; Jewish congregations, $9,754,275; Universalist, $8,054,333, and so on down the long list of the forty-two religious bodies professing faith of one kind or another in the United States. Now as all this great aggregation of temporal wealth demands and receives the protection of law, it is manifestly fair that it should bear its just proportion of the state expenses.

It is, however, so far as Arizona is concerned, a matter for the conscience and consideration of our law makers. For our part we believe in equal rights before the law in suffrage and taxation.

Now that Mr. Putnam has left the territory, the friends out there would be glad to see Mrs. Freeman or some other of our field workers, and we are sure that a cordial welcome would be accorded to whoever could make a tour of the embryo Liberal commonwealth at this crucial time. One of our correspondents in Arizona wishes to know what states at present impose a tax on the church, and to what extent. California nominally taxes the property of the ecclesiastical associations, but we are informed that those associations, like wealthy corporations of other kinds, often find ways to evade the payment of the assessments. Sometimes the assessor is initially incapable of doing his duty, and sometimes he is tampered with by the interested property owners. Again, if the assessment has been made all right, an injunction is asked for restraining the officials from collecting the tax; the injunction, supposed to be only temporary, is, through the neglect to test decisively the question at issue, made permanent, to all intents and purposes. This is "government by injunction" in the interest of the divinely instituted "protector of the morals of the people." Until church officers become honest the battle will be only half won when the legislature passes and the governor signs a bill for the taxation of church property. It will take eternal vigilance to collect the tax. But this fact should not discourage the advocates of equality of taxation—rather it should spur them to renewed exertions. The more unscrupulous the beneficiaries of privileges are the greater the necessity that they be curbed in the hour of their comparative weakness, before exemption has aggrandized them so that they can openly defy the state. In this city the multimillionaire Trinity Church Corporation has neglected to supply its tenements with water above the first floor, and when the Board of Health had the officials fined for their flagrant disobedience to the law the corporation fought the case to the highest court in the state, and even now, after the court of appeals has decided that the water pipes must be put in, the pious trustees are wasting their strength in protests through the press and otherwise, instead of doing what decent property owners would have done without the mandate of a court.

The lower house of the Colorado legislature has recently passed a bill taxing church property above $2,500. As the basis of assessment is one-third, this bill, if it becomes a law, will leave all ecclesiastical property in the state which is not worth more than $7,500, still exempt. It is to be hoped that Arizona can do better than this, although the victory won in the Centennial state is by no means to be despised.

Our correspondent states that it is told in Arizona by the advocates of exemption that the churches in the District of Columbia were once sold for taxes, but that Congress reconsidered the matter and had them returned to the religious societies. We know nothing of any such transaction. Of course, it is barely possible that long ago, under the operation of some of the numerous Maryland or Congressional statutes, something of the kind happened to a church in the District, but it is not material whether the story is true or false—it has nothing to do with the principle of equal taxation nor with the present imperative necessity for the repeal of the exemption laws of the states and territories.

In the Banner State.

I often wonder if all the platform workers in other states are as hard at work as we are in Oregon. I hope so. Miss Nettie A. Olds and myself are keeping up the interest of three circuits—Portland, Forest Grove, and McMinnville—by changing platforms twice a month, assisting each other in our entertainments, and having perfect coöperation all along the line. Miss Olds is exceptional in ability among ten thousand young women. She wins the affection of both old and young, and is a very successful worker.

Owing to adverse circumstances the report of our Paine anniversaries is late in reaching you. We agreed that she should report the Christmas and New Year's entertainments, and I the Paine celebrations, but, as you will see later, my excuse for tardiness is legal. The first anniversary was held in Portland, when the First Secular Church invited the Turners and Spiritualists to unite with the Secularists in one grand demonstration. A fine program was arranged by Miss Olds, consisting of music and recitations, together with full orchestra, and Mrs. A. E. Barker as orator. I would like to speak of each number, for all were good, but space forbids; yet I must mention the Sunday-school's twenty-four little fellows who sang a chorus—

A white lie, a black lie—
No matter, 'tis the same;
A lie is a lie, my girls and boys,
Whatever be its name.

It was so perfectly rendered that it brought forth tremendous applause. Another chorus, in German, by the Turnverein singing section (thirty-two voices) was exceedingly fine. The president of the Turners' association made a short speech in German on the life of Paine, and the exercises closed with a few timely remarks by Miss Olds upon the importance of co-operation on the part of all Liberal organizations. After that we danced, and the whole was a success.

At 7:40 the following morning, the beginning of a perfect day, Miss Olds and myself took the train for McMinnville. At Forest Grove we were met by members of the Secular Sunday-school, who accompanied us to McMinnville to assist in the exercises. Here, after catching an hour's sleep, we went to the opera house, where we helped to decorate the stage with evergreens and appropriate mottoes, and exercised the pupils of the Sunday-school in their work. I cannot express my appreciation of the assistance rendered me by Mrs. Mary A. Booth in drilling my children in my absence. The loyalty of every member of the McMinnville Union is above praise. Our musical and literary exercises were similar to those in Portland. The song and flag drill was especially fine. A tribute to Thomas Paine, in rhyme, by two little tots four years old, Ethel Ford and Lola Walker, was applauded and encored. Another beautiful feature of the evening was a solo by one of my Forest Grove nestlings, little Lessie Crow, entitled "My Gray Kitten." He is five years old and has the sweetest of soprano voices. A solo was also sung by the leading soprano of my juvenile choir at Forest Grove, Miss Ada Robinson, ten years old. Miss Ada bids fair to be among the leading singers of Oregon. An oration by Mrs. Barker on "Thomas Paine as a Man" closed the exercises. We then adjourned to Wright's hall, which the good Liberals had decorated for the dancers, and in which they had also set the table for a midnight dinner. All around, it was a success; besides, the whole affair was pronounced the best conducted and most genteel event known to McMinnville. At 5 o'clock on the morning of the 29th Miss Olds, myself, and the children took the train for Forest Grove, where, after catching another hour's sleep, we repaired to Vert's Liberal hall to rehearse for the evening's entertainment. The hall had been decorated already with evergreens and flags, and its attractiveness was further enhanced by two transparencies—"Thomas Paine, Author-Hero of the Revolution," and "Spare the Man but Kill the Monarchy." Large portraits of Paine and Ingersoll and of George Washington and Martha Washington adorned the rear of the stage, all of them united by the motto, "Our Heroes," in silver letters; under Paine and Washington, "1776;" under Ingersoll, "1895." Our program of fourteen numbers was musical and literary; Mrs. Barker orator of the evening. There were some good Christian people here who did not want the town flag flung to the breeze on this occasion; but, gentlemen, it went to the top of the flagstaff, and floated there until night, when it was lowered and festooned across the front of our stage in place of the drop curtain. Our exercises opened with a full chorus, followed by a recitation by one of our brightest young ladies, Miss Ina Freeman, "Charles Sumner's Address to the National Flag." Every number was good, but I cannot close without mentioning a few in this report. The Forest Grove juvenile choir is considered the best in the state. Their song, "Freedom's Banner," with flag drill, was excellent. They win the highest praise from all who hear them, and they deserve it. I have had them under my tuition now one year. Little Lessie Crow—and he is the whitest crow you ever saw, for flaxen hair hangs in tight curls around his head—with his sweet voice sang "I'm a Roaming Little Darkey," bringing down the house. Each night my oration was followed by a recitation from Miss Addie Doney, "A Tribute to Thomas Paine." She is ten years of age and a fine elocutionist. The exercises occupied two hours and forty minutes, ending with a recitation by Miss Nettie A. Olds, a selection from Ingersoll's Prose Poems. Thus were closed three successive anniversary celebrations of the great Infidel, Thomas Paine.

Of course this made our opponents feel that they must "demonstrate" also; so on the Thursday following Thomas Paine was hanged in effigy in the Congregational church yard, and on the next Sunday Rev. Charles Edward Locke, pastor of the Taylor street Methodist church of Portland, delivered a sermon on the "Fruits of Infidelity." He discoursed at length upon "Tom" Paine, and was reported in the Oregonian. He was answered by a dozen or more able men and women, which called out another sermon, "Paine from History." I was requested to answer these attacks, which I did on February 22d at the Orpheum theater, Portland. To-night, the 25th, the Liberal element, with the Secular Church of Portland and the Turners at the head, meet in a grand demonstration for Paine with C. B. Reynolds as orator of the evening.

Mr. Reynolds addressed the Forest Grove people morning and evening, Sunday, Feb. 24th, and will speak at McMinnville, Sunday, March 3d. It is not necessary for me to tell you how much he was appreciated by our people, as he was known to you long ago.

It was my sad duty to conduct the funeral services of a little boy, a baby brother to four of our Sunday-school children—little Ralph Voss, aged nineteen months—on my return from my second defense of Paine. Thus sorrows and joys flit through our lives, making us what we are.

Now for the reasons why I have not reported earlier: On the 30th of January I started to the legislature at Salem, where I met Hon. Lee McLaughlin and Katie Kehm Smith, we three constituting the legislative committee of the Oregon State Secular Union to work for the taxation of church property. I was there two weeks and three days. On my return many duties awaited me, which, together with the answer to Dr. Locke, have occupied all my time. Hoping you may find a place for this long report, I subscribe myself your co-worker, Forest Grove, Or. Mrs. A. E. BARKER.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

The semi-annual election of officers of the First Secular Church of Portland, held on the 10th inst., resulted as follows: Mr. Chas. Hagner, president; Mr. Geo. Bailey, Mrs. Dewey, Mr. A. Fiestle, Mr. F. Neunert, Mr. S. S. Long, and Mrs. May Hagner, vice-presidents; W. E. Jones, treasurer; Mrs. Clara Bailey, secretary.

Since the organization of the church, Mr. Hagner has been the mainstay, for many months advancing money for hall rent, music, etc., out of his own pocket. He is a prominent member and active worker in the labor organizations in this city, and by securing a hall jointly with them has enabled us to reduce our expenses nearly one-half. He has always considered himself a committee of one to act in whatever capacity it seemed necessary, and the success of the organization is largely due to his personal efforts. As proof of their appreciation and as testimony to their confidence, the members of the Secular Church unanimously elected him president.

The entire board is composed of representative Liberals, and under its management much good work will be accomplished.

Our friend and co-worker, Mr. C. B. Reynolds, of Tacoma, is with us. He has applied for a license from the Oregon State Secular Union and will lend his efforts to aid the cause in this state. This is a grand victory for Oregon. With the assistance of such men as C. B. Reynolds, for what dare we not hope in future? Lecturers we need and will have. There is not a town in the state where a local society cannot be organized when we have a lecturer to put in charge. As the summer months draw near, we are assured that a number of our Eastern friends will enter the work as lecturers in the "banner state for Freethought."

The prospects for a public debate are now attracting the attention of a great many people here. Rev. I. D. Driver, the champion of Methodism, who recently published himself as "the greatest lecturer of the age against Infidelity," and who claims to have "successfully answered Colonel Ingersoll and his chosen debaters, having been called to Chicago especially for that purpose," has been challenged by the First Secular Church to meet Mr. C. B. Reynolds in debate. The morning after the challenge was presented, Mr. Driver took a "drive" out to southern Oregon. He will return, however, and if the debate takes place, you will hear of it.

Some Recollections of Frederick Douglass.

In reading the account of the obsequies of the distinguished man whom Rochester has just buried, I lived over some of the years when I was engaged with him in the work of the slave's redemption; and though there are several biographies of him now before the public, some things belonging to the period before the war and showing the treatment which Rochester gave Mr. Douglass and family, recalled now, in contrast with the honors which on Feb. 26th the city, as well as the thousands of private citizens, bestowed upon the remains of their former townsman, may prove of interest to many of your readers. I have walked with Mr. Douglass as I would have walked with any other gentleman, when even the children would call out, "Nigger—two niggers!" I have heard him addressed, when speaking in the Rochester city hall, as "nigger," and the audience were asked to whitewash him—the acting mayor present, but no reproof for the rowdies. I was once invited to a gathering in the town of Holly, where a colloquy was to be had and a dinner in the open air. Mr. Douglass was also invited, as he would report the colloquy for his paper. The ladies left the table, for they would not "eat with a nigger." In the carriage that conveyed us to the station Mr. Douglass took a seat, and the editor of a paper, published, I think, at Medina, objected to riding in the vehicle with the Negro. I have invited Mr. Douglass and wife to my home, with some distinguished guest from Europe, when all the children, some of a pretty large growth, would place themselves just outside my premises and devote the entire time of my visitors' stay to all sorts of disagreeable talk about "niggers" and "nigger worshippers."—Yesterday the central church held for the time being his honored remains!

I was one of a company, with Mr. Douglass and his daughter, who went to the Universalist church to hear some distinguished speaker, when the sexton was so disturbed that he came near resigning his office; for I insisted that the Douglasses should occupy a seat with the others of the party.

Well, time works wonders. Perhaps some of us Freethinkers, in the century upon which we are about to enter, may be called respectable people. Even to-day Thomas Paine is spoken of in the presence of Christians, and some of them are sufficiently civilized to hear the name without sneering.

If the ministers could only find an occupation besides preaching that would give them a living, how fast the world would improve! Libraries would multiply; people would work for this world and patiently wait for the work of another when they should be born into it.

Should Free Speech Ever Be Restricted?

In the Boston Globe of March 3d there is a symposium in reply to the above question, and William Lloyd Garrison contributes this unequivocal answer:

"One would think that the history of the world had settled for all time the futility of restricting free speech. As well attempt to cap Vesuvius. Speech is the safety-valve of thought. Even if mistaken or vicious, it loses its power the moment it is uttered. Suppressed it is as dangerous as dynamite, which then becomes a logical result.

"Only distrust in popular government prompts the attempt to curb freedom of expression. The various schemes proposed to shield this country from the incoming of Anarchists, the sensitiveness regarding utterances contravening popular beliefs, as recently illustrated by the foolish effort to forbid Colonel Ingersoll's lecturing in Hoboken, the impatient wish, so often expressed, to silence certain advocates of ideas held to be contrary to good morals and government—all betray faithlessness in truth and in the people.

"Freedom is the sure antidote for free speech. This fear that the people cannot safely hear the most pernicious doctrines is a confession that democracy is a failure. Self-government is founded on the axiom that the wisdom of all is greater than the wisdom of the most enlightened few. In great national crises we have always been saved by the plain common people, and not by the colleges or the wealthy classes.

"Much more dangerous and to be dreaded than the Anarchists or Socialists is the citizen who would suppress free speech. They are the legitimate children of restriction, and need the medicine of liberty. I wish there were a hall in every city where untrammelled speech could find vent, even though it were aimed at government, morals, or religion. The sooner would the people's reason and good sense discern the errors, which would then be harmless. Powder exposed to the air soon loses its explosive possibilities.

"If, at this stage of the experiment, the great republic is afraid of its fundamental principles, has more faith in the power of ignorance than of knowledge, of evil than of good, let us adopt the language of Dr. Holmes:

"... then Liberty, good-night! Pack up your ballot-box and go to blazes!"

"Fortunately, the people who think are more potent than many who talk, and when educated pessimism urges paternal restraints, and predicts calamity with universal suffrage, echo Milton's inspiring defiance: 'Let Truth and Falsehood grapple; whoever knew Truth put to the worst in a free and open encounter?'"

Incapability of change is incapability of improvement; and incapability of change in externals, with whatsoever fair names it may glorify itself, is nothing else than an involuntary testimony of the dying out of the inward life, a deceptively veiling over of death.—Bunsen.

Observations.

Editor C. C. Moore sees things as through blue glass darkly. Speaking in his paper, the Blade, of a book he wrote while (unjustly) in jail, he observes that, apart from "Fleta," a law book, and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," his is the only book composed under similar circumstances. So Mr. Moore, though a professed exponent of Rationalism, has not heard of Thomas Paine in the Luxembourg prison writing Part I. of the "Age of Reason;" of Robert Taylor in Oakham jail producing his "Diegesis" and "Synagma;" of George William Foote in Holloway "gaol" engaged on "A Prisoner for Blasphemy," nor of D. M. Bennett in the Albany penitentiary devoting his leisure hours to a series of letters entitled "Behind the Bars," and composing the two-volume octavo, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." Editor Moore's advocacy of Rationalism might be rendered more coherent by familiarity with its History. He should add knowledge to his understanding, and mingle thought with his literary labors.

As is to be seen in many instances which might be mentioned, intolerant religious laws and restrictive marriage laws travel and lodge together, and are supported by the same individual and associated bigots. Such marriage laws may be approved by some sort of experience which the race has never yet had, but they are in devilish bad company now.

The clergy of Woonsocket, R. I., have called upon one another to take the necessary steps to keep their congregations away from a spielkartenfest held for the benefit of the Woonsocket hospital. A spielkartenfest, I take it, is a card-playing festival or contest. The objection to it in the minds of the clergymen is that it teaches children the fascinations of the game, and that "while people should be preparing by prayer and self-examination for the revival, spielkarten music, costumes, and pictures are flitting through their minds to the destruction of more serious thought." This means no more nor less than that the event is likely to make the Woonsocketers happy when God has permitted that they might be miserable. Card playing and praying are both respectable old offenders. The former has been diverted to the ends of gambling, because a game of cards determines two chances—one to win, the other to lose. Praying, however, is never gambled on, because it determines nothing. Everything stands exactly as before. It may be safely coped with to lose, but as there is nothing but mouth behind it, nothing is won by the better. There is not a sport in the world who would back a prayer game. It lacks the element of chance, being dead sure to lose unless mechanical means are employed to affect the result. If all the evil produced by card playing, and which would not exist without it, were placed on one side of the account, and all its benefits in the way of keeping people out of mischief on the other, there would be a balance in its favor greater than all the good ever accomplished by prayer. I have even heard of an instance where gambling surpassed prayer at its own game—that of comforting the afflicted. It was on the steamship Gascogne, which, with a broken piston rod, rolled for a week almost at the mercy of the worst storm that has struck the Atlantic for years. The passengers were frightened, as they had cause to be, and the longer they prayed the more nervous they got. But there was that on board which restored confidence. They could look through the windows of the smoking-room and see men playing poker, some for stakes that had no limit but the upper deck. The calmness of the players was a tonic which the fearful saints took a dose of, and it braced them up out of the depression to which praying had reduced them. Prayer did not save the ship, nor did cards; but the captain and crew did, and they were materially assisted in their duties by the composure and good conduct of the passengers.

The Woonsocket spielkartenfest might be condemned as a waste of time for which there are more profitable uses, but prayer meetings are open to the same criticism. Still, the occasion may teach some to play who otherwise would not learn, and thus enable them to be of service in crises like that in which the passengers on the Gascogne were placed when they found in the example of card players the comfort which prayer could not give nor take altogether away.

A number of eminent men chosen to do the thinking for larger or smaller groups of persons, who pay them by the year, have contributed lately to a collection of thoughts on the labor question. The special point to which they were solicited to direct their attention is "The Coming Solution of the Social Strife between Capital and Labor." Bishop Newman, who, without overthinking himself, provides exertion for a large congregation of Methodists, says that "if the conscientious practice of Christianity cannot solve the vast and perplexing problem," then there is no hope. But I understand that the "vast and perplexing problem" is a product of our civilization, which by religious people is called Christian, and I know of no reason for apprehending any more conscientious practice of Christianity in the future than has distinguished the past. Bishop Newman is therefore out of the orchestra and may as well hang up his fiddle.

Cardinal Gibbons, who is a representative Catholic thought purveyor and business manager, proposes arbitration; but that would eliminate from the form of "social strife" called a "strike" all that makes it attractive and enjoyable. How would the cardinal view the prospect of arbitration between Satan and Jehovah, involving mutual concessions, and which, if successful, would leave himself, General Master Workman Leo XIII., Walking Delegate Satolli, and all the other clerical agitators, without a grievance? What is he giving us?

Now comes a man without bolus or anodyne, and who is so poverty-stricken brainwise that he does not know it all. He is College President Eliot, of Harvard, and this is his confession:

I am sorry to say that I have but little idea what "the coming solution of the social strife between capital and labor" is going to be. My impression is that this strife, which has been developing for hundreds of years, will be removed only by gradual processes in operation through hundreds of years.

Regardless of President Eliot's deficiency, as denoted by his confidence in evolution and his failure to express belief in miracle cure, if he has ever written a work on economics, I should be glad to read it. But listen to one who does know it all, who is not a college president, and who has written volumes on political economy. This one is Henry George, and I remark that he knows it all for the reason that if he did not he would be unprepared to say with certainty, as such knowledge now enables him to do, that there is but one name under heaven and among workingmen whereby we shall be saved.

The only possible solution of what is called the social strife between capital and labor is the Single Tax.

All the comfort an evolutionist can extract from this declaration of Mr. George's is in the words "what is called," which seem to admit a possibility that the strife the other thinkers are considering does not necessarily exist; and that is my conception of the labor question. Being an observer rather than a thinker, the strife presents itself as a conflict between laborers organized and laborers unorganized; none but the organized division participating in the conflict with capital, and such hostilities being merely incidental to their efforts to coerce capital into withholding employment from the unorganized contingent. If I am wrong I hope to be corrected; but if I am right, if the strife is that of one laborer with another—not a fight against capital, but for a daily dole of it in exchange for their services—and if the capitalist is not the adversary, but the bone of contention, which suffers neglect because the laborers are too busy fighting each other to gnaw it; then the solvers will have to get to work on a different basis. It can be said with confidence that if labor were harmonious, capital, valueless without it, would be its easy game, its plum, and its pie. Let us discuss "the coming solution of the social strife between" the men who insist that they shall name the conditions under which others may work and those who are compelled by necessity to work for what they can get.

Senator Quay of Pennsylvania, who has recently drawn the eye of the country toward himself by loud shouts in favor of giving public money to a religious school in his state, satisfies my notion of what a shyster should be. In 1892, when the members of Congress were talking about the World's Fair bills, Quay sent a Bible to the desk, and rising in his seat announced that the book contained his authority for an amendment he would offer ordering the Exposition closed on Sunday. The clerk read the "authority," which was as follows:

Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, etc.

Then another Senator arose and apologetically pointed out that while Mr. Quay's amendment read "Sunday, the first day of the week," the authority he had cited says "the seventh day," which would be Saturday. But Quay would withdraw neither his amendment nor his "authority." On the contrary, he requested that the clerk insert "first day" in place of "seventh day" in the scriptural quotation. The Pennsylvania Senator's fraud, which, if practiced in court of law, would disbar him, went upon the records, and the Senate, with its foundations laid in the scriptures so revised, proceeded to enact religious legislation. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

The Liberal Club.

The drizzle of last Friday night did not deter a big audience from attending the seven hundred and oddth regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. As the man with a badge on his wife inducted his family into the dazzling precincts of German Masonic hall, and saw what a crowd had gathered, he wondered where all could have found seats who would have come if it had really rained. The customs of the far West seem to be moving this way, for it is said that in Portland, Or., where it rains most of the time, the ladies never appear in representative numbers unless there are signs of wet. All the chairs were full, and many people sat upon campstools, the occasional collapses of which did something to enliven the proceedings.

Dr. E. B. Foote, jr., presided, but he brought no oral jokes with him and offered only his foot-ball hair as a silent pun. He introduced Mr. Franklin Steiner, of Des Moines, Ia., as the speaker of the evening. Steiner is a model lecturer. He is built for the platform, and his person and voice help him out a great deal. The material of his lecture on "Morality without Religion" is excellent. Morality, as he presents it, is wholly a matter of human relations; and conduct, instead of being judged as good or evil by what some god has said on the subject, is to be approved or condemned according to its results in the long run. Secular morality, Mr. Steiner said, is indifferent to both God and a future life, and holds that those conceptions are unnecessary to right living. While Secularism is neither Atheistic nor Materialistic in its affirmations, he held it would be no discredit to the system if it were.

The critics procrastinated for a while, though later they came on two at a time. Mr. Gustavson, a tall gentleman with frizzled hair, took the platform first. Morality, Mr. Gustavson intimated, was defective as now taught and to some extent practiced. Its doctrines, he said, were inculcated at the school of Mrs. Grundy, who employed as teachers Mr. Respectability, a gentleman from whom the vigor of life had departed, and Miss Purity, a maiden lady in eyeglasses, who bore a white lily in her hand. These two made war upon Cupid and robbed him of his "love-flowers" whenever they discovered him outside the marriage chamber. In which and other parables did Mr. Gustavson set forth the doctrine of social freedom.

A non-member named Moran, who wore a necktie like a coach-whip pennant, desired to make a few remarks, and was permitted to do so. Mr. Moran complimented the lecturer's style as admirable and expressed regret that he could not pay the same tribute to his processes of reasoning. As for Secularism and Secular morality, Mr. Moran had never heard of them before, but he knew enough about science to see its defects. Science, he said, halted at appearances and failed to recognize the ultimate cause, or God, back of phenomena. In the view of this speaker man is nothing but his own thoughts; all external things are phantoms of the mind, and the world is merely a show. The audience before him might imagine that they were to him actual persons, but they had no value outside of his mind. To regard phenomena as objective realities was a pernicious error. Passing to a criticism of the lecturer's remarks about the uselessness of theology and its priests, Mr. Moran stated that Copernicus, the founder of the present system of astronomy, was a monk, and that his work setting forth the heliocentric theory was published under the patronage of the pope; that Galileo was not disciplined for astronomy, but for contumacy in contending that the Bible sustained the Copernican doctrine; and that while the Burning of Bruno was a regrettable incident, it was his own fault.

Wilson McDonald discussed a future life, of the certainty of which he was assured. He had several times demonstrated the same to those present. An Irishman followed Mr. McDonald, whom he alluded to as "Mc," but did not clarify the subject. Mr. Dobson then gained the platform and furnished the most interesting case of youthful confidence noted at the Club since E. C. Walker's baby followed him to the same eminence not long ago. A German gentleman of a scientific turn of mind demonstrated by reference to the pyramids that the earth's weight had not been changed for five thousand years, and argued thence that no spirits could have left the sphere during that period unless, like the doctrine of Spiritualism, there was nothing to them. Dr. Caleb S. Weeks adverted to a book which he had lately published, with 171 illustrations and 240 pages (New York, Fowler & Wells), and said that he had therein set forth the fact that Veneration was the lowest of the spiritual faculties, being the organ of appetite for the marvelous, and analogous to the physical bump of Alimentiveness. The curse of theology, said Dr. Weeks, consists not in a belief in a future life, but in the attempts of priests to enforce that and other religious doctrines.

The last of the critics was Mr. T. B. Wakeman, who, after characterizing the lecture of the evening as sound and solid, proceeded to the cheerful task of annihilating Mr. Moran. It is remarkable, said Mr. Wakeman, what queer things sometimes blow into this hall when there is a draft through the door. He called Mr. Moran a Meipsist (from me, me, and ipse, myself), adding that owing to the absurdity of the meipsic philosophy, it had quite a following. As to Meipsist Moran's theory that externals existed only subjectively, Mr. Wakeman explained that the subjectiv or internal was merely a duplicate of the objectiv or external, the former produced by the latter and incapable of existence without it. He then went on to say that Meipsist Moran was destitute of knowledge on the subject of Copernicus and Galileo. The truth was that the founder of the heliocentric system inscribed his work to the pope to save his life, and then, as a further precaution against persecution, delayed publication until the hour of his demise, reading his last proof-sheet while upon his death-bed. As to Galileo, it is a historical fact, now placed beyond doubt by President White, of Cornell, in his "Warfare of Science," that this astronomer was put under surveillance, imprisoned, and in all likelihood tortured to extort a recantation. This was not, as Mr. Moran had said, because he taught that the Bible supported the Copernican theory, but because he pointed out that the astronomy of the Bible and the church was wrong. Mr. Wakeman likewise made caustic remarks about Moran's admission that the burning of Bruno was an impolite, not to say unkind, thing to do.
